Soma (sō'ma). [Skt., 'extract,' from √su, extract.] In Sanskrit, a plant and its sap, often personified as a god; also, the moon. This plant, now represented by the Sarcostemma viminalis or Asclepias acida, was in Vedic times collected by moonlight on certain mountains, stripped of its numerous leaves, and then carried to the place of sacrifice, where the priests crushed the stalks between stones, sprinkled them with water, and placed them on a sieve or strainer for purification, whereupon the acid juice trickled into a vessel, after which it was mixed with clarified butter, barley, etc., allowed to ferment, and offered in libations to the gods, or drunk by the Brāhmans. By sometimes described as brought from the sky by a falcon and guarded by the Gandharvas, or as brought by the daughters of the Sun from a spot where it had been nourished by Parjanya, the rain-god, whom the Rigveda represents as its father. All the 114 hymns of the 9th Mandala of the Rigveda, besides many others in this Veda, and the whole Sāmaveda, are devoted to its praise. In some parts of India soma-sacrifices are still offered, but the use of the plant is little known, and it is questionable whether the plant now regarded as the soma is really that of the Vedas. The modern medical work of Sushruta distinguishes 24 varieties. The juice was regarded in Vedic times as a nectar conferring eternal life and vigor on its drinkers, whether gods or men, and was a favorite propitiatory offering. In its character as a god it was represented as primeval, all-powerful, all-pervading, bestowing all blessings, etc. The worship of Soma has great similarity to the Dionysiac and Bacchic worship of the Greeks and Romans. The name becomes in the Brāhmaṇa period a designation of the moon, with yellow flowers and knotty stalk, growing in Ghilan, Mazandaran, Shirvan, and Yazd, also its juice and the Genius of the plant. Haoma is often invoked in the Avesta, where the Ha-ôm Yasna is devoted to his praises. The haoma plays a great part in the rites of the Parsis. The prominence of Soma and Haoma in the Veda and the Avesta, the perfectly similar character of the most important indications of an original Indo-Iranian unity. The name soma came to designate the moon in post-Vedic period probably from the fact that the moon was regarded as the yellow drop in the sky.

Somali (sō-mä'lē), or Somal (sō-mäl'). A Hamitic nation inhabiting the Eastern Horn of Africa — that is, the arid region between the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb and a point south of the Juba River. They are mixed with Arab blood in the north and with Negro blood in the south, and vary, therefore, much in color and form. Their language, which is practically one in the whole region, is decidedly Hamitic, and has no written character or literature. The Somali are pastoral, owning herds of camels, horses, sheep, and goats: their limited agriculture is carried on by domestic slaves. Nominally Mohammedan and split into many petty tribes, they are fiercely opposed to foreign intrusion, though naturally sociable and jovial. The Hashia and Hawiya are the principal subtribes. England and Italy claim most of the Somali coast.

Somanatha (sō-ma-nä'thą). The name of a celebrated Linga, or emblem of Shiva, or of the temple where it was set up at Somanathapattana, or Somnath Pattan, in the peninsula of Kathiawar in Guzerat. The temple was one of 12 Linga temples held in special veneration. A legend devised to explain the name, the precise meaning of which is uncertain, relates that Soma propitiated Shiva by great austerities performed there, whereupon Shiva granted him a boon, and Soma set up a Linga on the spot where he had done penance. This makes the name mean 'the lord of Soma,' in the sense of the divinity set up by Soma.

Sopherim (sof'e-rim). [Heb.] Writers; scribes. In the Old Testament the title sopher is applied to Ezra, who is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra vii. 6). It was in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, when the law became the code of Jewish life, that the institution of the Sopherim took its origin. The task of these men was to explain the law, and to adapt it to the ever-changing conditions of social and political life. They were thus in a measure the successors and followers of the prophets. As the latter gave new revelations, they also engaged in multiplying and spreading Pentateuch by writing, each transcript receiving the old Hebrew script, no longer in use. The Sopherim, moreover, into the square character is still in use. The Sopherim also considered their important functions of teachers and founders of academies in schools. They were called Rabbi, "the men of the great synagogue," and were succeeded by the Tanaim and Amoraim. The results of the labors and activity of these teachers of the law thought, sayings, and maxims are laid down in the Talmud.

Ἁγία Σοφία, wisdom, the church being dedicated to Christ as the hypostatized wisdom of God.] The famous metropolitan church of the Greek sat Constantinople, built by Justinian: since 1453 a mosque. Its plan is considered to have been modified preceding a square the central portion of which is covered by the great dome, 105 feet in diameter and 181 high exterior, in whose base opening on a circle of windows. The semidome of the eastern exedra is covered by two lesser semidomes, which buttress the central dome. The arches have gilded bronze ceiling-ornaments, and the pendentives and the vaults and arches are covered with superb mosaics on gold ground, all the decorations appearing in these are now masked with whitewash. The walls are also covered with marbles. The exterior of the venerable church is now plain and unimpressive.

Sophia, Santa, The Little. The church of Sts. Sergius and Bacchus at Constantinople, finished by Justinian in 527 A. D., and now a mosque. It is quadrangular, with a dome and two tiers of vaulted arcades. There is a narthex and an apse, and fine mosaics under the whitewash.

Sophia Dorothea (sō-fī'ä dor-ō-thē'ä). Electress of Hannover. Born Sept. 15, 1666; died Nov. 13, 1726. Daughter of the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg-Celle, wife of the elector George of Hanover (later George I. of England), and mother of George II. She was divorced Dec. 28, 1694, on account of her relations with Count Königsmark, and remained for the rest of her life a prisoner in Ahlden Castle.

Sophie Charlotte, Queen of Prussia. Born Oct. 20, 1668; died Feb. 1, 1705. Wife of Frederick I., king of Prussia: noted for her literary and philosophical tastes. Charlottenburg was named from her.

Sophocles (sof'ō-klēz). [Gr. Σοφοκλῆς.] Born at Colonus, near Athens, 495 or 496 B. C.: died 406 B. C. One of the three great tragic poets of Greece. He defeated Æschylus for the tragic prize in 468, and was defeated by Euripides in 441. He was one of the Athenian generals in the Samian war (440). He added the third actor to the drama, and made various changes in the chorus. His tragedies include "Œdipus Tyrannus" (or "Œdipus Rex"), "Œdipus Coloneus," "Antigone," "Electra," "Philoctetes," "Ajax," and "Maidens of Trachis."

From this date till his death, at the age of 90, the poet devoted all his energy to the production of those famous works of art, which gave him undisputed rank over the Athenian public that he came to be considered the very ideal of a tragic poet, and was worshipped under the name of a hero, under the title Dexion. He is said to have won eighteen or twenty tragic victories, and, though sometimes postponed to Philocles and others, was never placed third in all his life. The author of the "Prometheus" and the Alexandrian critics follow the judgment of the Attic public, and most modern critics have agreed with them that the tragedies of Sophocles are the most perfect that the world has ever seen.

Mahaffy. Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 280.

Sophocles. A Greek portrait-statue, in the Laterran Museum, Rome. The face is full-bearded; the attitude upright and simple; the drapery a closely wrapped himation. The style is that of about 300 B. C. The statue is perhaps from a bronze original.

Sophron (sō'fron). [Gr. Σώφρων.] Lived about 440 B. C. A Syracusan writer of comedy, noted for his mimes. Fragments of his works have survived.

As to the subject-matter of the mimes were in prose or in verse I have thus like Walt Whitman's so-called poems which in the universe may yet give rise to a similar diversions. The names of Sophron were evidently ever to also "another parallel" and were full of poetic verse, and full of humour often using patois which is very rare in Greek literature. But Sophron's neglect of form did not imply a revolutionary creed: it was rather a carefully concealed submission to the laws of art.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. xc.

Sophronia (sof-ro'ni-ä). [Gr., 'of a sound mind.'] A character in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered."

Sophy (sō'fi). The. A play by Sir John Denham, acted in 1641 at Blackfriars, and printed in 1642. It is founded on a story in Herbert's "Travels."

Sorbonne (sôr-bon'). La. A celebrated house founded in the University of Paris about 1250 by Robert de Sorbon or Sorbonne, chaplain and confessor of Louis IX. The college of the Sorbonne became one of the foundations of Paris, and predominant one, of the faculty of theology in the university. It exercised a high influence in ecclesiastical affairs and on the public mind, especially in the 16th and 17th centuries. It was suppressed during the Revolution and deprived of its endowments. At the reconstruction of the university under Napoleon I. the building erected for it by Richelieu, and still called the Sorbonne, was ceded to the city of Paris on condition that the theological faculty, in connection with the faculties of science and belles-lettres, should remove there. New buildings were erected 1884-89.

Sordello (sôr-del'ō), or Sordel. Born at Goito, near Mantua, about 1180; died about 1255. A Provençal poet or troubadour. He was attached for a time to the household of the Count of Saint-Boniface, the chief of the Guelph party, in the march of Treviso, and afterward entered the service of Raimond Berenger, the last count of Provence of the house of Barcelona. It was thought at that time that the Italian language was not susceptible of polish and sonorous music in the Provençal language. As Sordello became in popular tradition a hero of romance, a proxy chevalier, and an Italian knight errant. Many fables were woven about his name. It was even said that the sovereignty of Mantua had been bestowed upon him. He owes his reputation principally to flattering mention of him he speaks of him with admiration eight times in the "Purgatorio." Nothing survives of his poems but the Italian poems, but about 34 Provençal poems still exist, and are included in Raynouard's "Choix des poésies des troubadours" and his "Lexique roman."

Sordello of Mantua, whose real merit consists in the harmony and sensibility of his verses. He was amongst the first to adopt the ballad form of writing, and in one of these, which has been translated by Millot, he beautifully contrasts, in the burthen of his ballad, the gaiety of nature and the ever-varying grief of a heart devoted to love. Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 163.

Sordello. A poem by Robert Browning, published in 1840. It is a picture of the restless and troubled ambition of modern Italy in the early part of the 13th century and a history of the development of the soul of Sordello, the troubadour. It is the most obscure of Browning's poems.

Soto (sō'tō). Hernando or Fernando de. Born at Badajos, Estremadura, in 1500 or 1501; died near the Mississippi River, May 21, 1542 (according to others, June 5 or June 30, 1542). A Spanish soldier, discoverer of the Mississippi. He went to Darien with Pedrarias, 1514; was with Cordoba in Nicaragua, 1524, and an encounter with Gil Gonzalez Davila, who had entered that country from the north; and opposed Cordoba's defection in 1525. In April, 1532, he accompanied Pizarro to Peru, and played with others for emeralds; and thereafter was prominent in the conquest of Peru, returning to Spain very rich in 1536. In 1537 he was appointed governor of Cuba and Florida, with orders to explore and settle the latter country. Leaving San Lucar in April, 1538, he finally sailed from Havana, Cuba, on May 12, 1539, with 9 vessels and 950 men, including many cavaliers of rank, landed at Tampa Bay, Florida, and, having sent part of his ships back to Cuba, set out on July 15 to explore the interior. His route during the next three years can be determined only approximately. He was constantly urged forward by the hope of finding new and rich countries; during the winter months he halted at Indian villages, and he twice had communication with his vessels on the coast. Reckoning by the present state boundaries, he first made a great circuit northward through northern Florida, Georgia, perhaps the Carolinas and Tennessee, and Alabama, descending the Alabama River to Mobile Bay, where he had a fierce battle with the Indians (Oct. 1540). Thence he turned northward and northwestward through Mississippi, wintered at an Indian village on the Yazoo, where he had another battle; and reached the Mississippi River, crossing it at the Lower Chickasaw Bluffs about May, 1541. Subsequently he explored northward nearly to the Missouri, then turned southward, reached the junction of the Red River and the Mississippi, and died there of malarial fever: 2/3 of his men had perished. The survivors, under Moscoso, descended the river and reached Mexico. It should be noted that Alonso de Pineda discovered the mouth of the Mississippi (which he called the Espiritu Santo) in 1519, and that Cabeza de Vaca crossed it near its mouth, in 1528.

He left France on account of his opposition to the government in 1825, and settled at New Orleans, where he rose to distinction as a lawyer. He was a Democratic United States senator from Louisiana 1847-53, and United States minister to Spain 1853-55. He was one of the framers of the Ostend Manifesto in 1854, and sided with the Confederacy during the Civil War. He was arrested in Washington in 1861 and imprisoned at Fort Lafayette, but obtained his release on condition that he would not return to the South until the suppression of the rebellion.

Soulouque (sö-lö-kē'), Faustin Élie. Born at Petit Goâve, 1785; died there, Aug. 6, 1867. A Haitian general and politician. He was a negro slave; took part in the insurrections of 1792 and 1803; rose to be general under Christophe and Dessalines; and the latter was elected to the presidency, March 1, 1847, principally because he was old and ignorant and it was supposed that he would be a ready tool of the senators. He displayed much independence, however, and sought the support of the blacks; and, though unsuccessful in an invasion of the Dominican Republic (March, April, 1849), had himself proclaimed Emperor as Faustin I., June 26, 1849. In 1855 he again invaded the Dominican Republic, but was defeated. He was deposed Jan. 15, 1849, and lived in exile until shortly before his death.

Sousa (sō'zä), Martim Afonso de. Born at Bragança about 1500; died at Lisbon, July 21, 1564. A Portuguese captain. He commanded the first expedition sent to Brazil for colonization (1530–32), and founded the first European settlement at São Vicente, Jan., 1532. In 1534 he was granted the captaincy of São Vicente (which see) in hereditary right, and he continued to attend to its affairs though he did not again visit it personally. He was admiral in the seas of India 1534–40, commanding in several combats; and from 1542 to 1545 he was governor of the Portuguese East Indies.

Sousa, Gonçalo de. Bornabout 1503; died on the coast of Madagascar, Dec., (?), 1539. A Portuguese captain, brother of M. A. de Sousa. He commanded two caravels in his brother's fleet (1530–33), and by his orders explored the lower Parana (1531–32). He received, in hereditary right, three portions of Brazil, corresponding to northern Pernambuco and Parahyba, a portion of São Paulo, and Santa Catharina: some attempt was made to settle the last-named of these provinces whom he appointed. In 1539 he commanded a fleet sent to the East Indies, and was shipwrecked and killed while returning. He wrote an account of the Brazilian expedition which has been published in recent times.

Sousa, Thomé de. Born about 1510; died after 1563. A Portuguese administrator, first governor-general of Brazil (1549–53). He founded São Salvador, or Bahia, April, 1549.

South (south), Robert. Born at Hackney, near London, 1633; died at London, July 8, 1716. A noted Anglican divine. He was made prebendary of Westminster in 1663; came into favor with Charles II. of Islip in 1678. He began in 1686 a literary controversy, on the subject of the Trinity, with Sherlock, which aroused such high passions of feeling that they put a stop to by the king. His "Works" appeared in 1823.

South Africa (af'ri-kä). A name given collectively (and somewhat vaguely) to that portion of Africa south of the Zambesi and Angola, most of which is under British influence. The chief political divisions are Cape Colony, Natal, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Pondoland, the territories of the British South Africa Company, the Orange Free State, South African Republic, and German Southwest Africa.

South Africa Company, British. See British South Africa Company.

South African Republic, or the Transvaal (trans-väl'). A republic in southern Africa. Capital, Pretoria; largest town, Johannesburg. It is bounded by the British South Africa Company's territory on the north; Portuguese East Africa on the east; Zululand, Natal, and the Orange Free State on the south; and the Bechuanaland Protectorate and colony on the west. The surface is in part, with the Drakeberg Mountains in the east. The chief river-systems are those of the Vaal and Limpopo. The republic exports wool, minerals, hides, ostrich feathers, etc.; and yields gold, diamonds, iron, etc. It contains 18 districts. The government is a republic under a nominal British suzerainty, administered by a president (assisted by a council) and a Volksraad of 24 members each. The inhabitants are Boers, English, and natives (Bechuanas, Basutos, etc.). The prevailing religion is the Dutch Reformed. The emigrants who left the Cape Colony commenced about 1836. The state was recognized as independent in 1852, and was annexed by Great Britain in 1877. A revolt of the Boers in 1880 led to a successful war conducted against the British in 1881. Self-government was restored in 1881, under British suzerainty, and British control was restricted in 1884. In 1890 small portions of Swaziland and Amatongland were ceded to the republic. Area, 113,642 square miles. White population (1890), 119,158; native population (1893), estimated, 368,329.

South America (a-mer'i-kä). The southern continental division of the New World, between the South Atlantic and Pacific oceans, connected with North America by the Isthmus of Panama. It forms a triangular mass with the southern angle lengthened out and terminating in the archipelago of Tierra del Fuego. The extreme points on the continent are Point Gallinas or Chimare, in Colombia, lat. 12° 25′ N.; Cape Froward, on the Strait of Magellan, lat. 53° 54′ S.; Ponta de Pedras, in Brazil, long. 50° 15′ 52″ W.; and Cape Parinas, in northern Peru, long. 81° 19′ 37″ W. The coast-line presents no large indentations, but near the southern end it is broken by numerous small bays and channels cutting off islands. More than two thirds of the surface lies within the tropics. The principal mountain system is the Andean, near the western coast, dividing into three divergent chains south of the equator, with an extension along the northern coast to the mouth of the Orinoco. There is a smaller mountain-system near the southeastern coast in Brazil, and some of the highlands of Guiana are mountainous in character. Three great river-systems, the Orinoco, Amazon and Paraguay-Parana, occupy corresponding broad depressions, which are but slightly raised above the sea-level. These depressions are separated by a south-north water-shed, which, separated by them are the great tableland of Brazil, with its mountains near the coast; the tableland of Guiana, with a mountain region near its center; and similar table-lands bordering the Andean system. These table-lands have an average elevation of about 2,500 or 3,000 feet, and are diversified in their vegetation, but with little that strongly marks their rivers. The most extensive forests are in the Amazon valley, and in the mountains of the northern and southeastern coast. The llanos, north of the Orinoco, and the pampas of the Argentine Republic are great grassy plains. The fauna and flora are extremely rich in species: the arc, however, but few large mammalia. South America was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was explored and largely conquered before 1535. It was conquered by the Spaniards and Portuguese; and their descendants, with Indians, negroes, and mixed races, are the chief part of the modern population. The Dutch and French had short-lived colonies in Brazil; and the English, Dutch, and French colonies in Guiana date from the 17th century. Brazil represents the Portuguese conquests; the other South American republics correspond to spanish colonies. But there is no close correspondence between independences. The independent states are Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, the Argentine Republic, Chile, Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia (including the Isthmus of Panama), and Venezuela. The rest of South America is divided into colonies of European powers. Large portions of the interior are inhabited only by scattered Indian tribes, and the boundaries of the republics are in many cases but ill unsettled. Extreme length, 4,555 miles. Greatest breadth, 3,200 miles. Estimated area, with the dependent islands and Greenland, 6,834,564 square miles. Estimated population (1892), 36,950,000.

South American Revolution. The political movement and war by which the Spanish South American colonies became independent. The principal causes were the restrictions on commerce, the love of Spanish republican independence, liberty, and unjust laws exclusion of the colonists from high offices; the Inquisition; and the examples of France and the United States. The immediate cause was the political condition of spanish affairs produced by Napoleon's invasion of spain. Most of the colonists refused to recognize Joseph Bonaparte as king of spain, and each province had represented the legitimate monarch, having fallen, the authority of the viceroys and captains-general disappeared. Juntas (councils) were formed in nearly all, and Sozomen (soz'ō-men) (Hermias Sozomenus). Born probably near Gaza, Palestine, about 400 A. D.; died about the middle of the 5th century. An ecclesiastical historian, author of a church history (edited by Valesius 1668).

The "ecclesiastical history" of Hermeias Sōzomenos Sozomenus, commonly known as Sozomen, was nearly contemporary and coextensive with that of Socrates [Scholasticus], whom Sozomen is supposed to have copied, as far at least as the plan of his work is concerned. It extends, as we now have it, from 324 to 425, but was designed to reach the year 439. It is divided into nine books, and is generally superior to the work of Socrates in elegance of style though it often exhibits puerilities which the other historian had avoided. Sozomen was born at Bethel, near Gaza, in Palestine, and spent most of his early years in the Holy Land, to which he makes familiar reference in several parts of his book.

Spain (spān). [Sp. España. Pg. Hespanha. It. Spagna, D. Spanje, F. Espagne, L. Hispania and Iberia, Gr. Ἰσπανία, Ἐσπερία (western land), and Ἰβηρία.] A kingdom of southwestern Europe, which occupies the greater part of the Iberian or Spanish peninsula. Capital, Madrid. It is bounded by the Bay of Biscay and France on the north, the Mediterranean on the east and south, the Strait of Gibraltar and the Atlantic on the southwest, and Portugal and the Atlantic on the west. The center is occupied by a tableland; and there are numerous mountain-ranges, including the Cantabrian Mountains, Sierra de Guadarrama, Sierra de Gredos, Mountains of Toledo, Sierra de Guadalupe, Sierra Morena, and Sierra Nevada. The principal rivers are the Ebro, Guadalquivir, Guadiana, Tagus, Duero, and Miño. Spain has very valuable mineral resources (especially quicksilver, lead, copper, silver, salt, zinc, etc.), and its principal products are wine (sherry, Malaga, etc.), grapes, raisins, olive-oil, oranges, figs, and other fruits, and cork. It comprises 47 provinces on the mainland, and from the Balearic and Canary groups and the provinces (Canaries and Balearic Islands). The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The legislative body is the Cortes, consisting of a senate and a chamber of deputies. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The language is Spanish. The early inhabitants were Celts and Iberians. Various coast towns were colonized by the Phenicians. The country was conquered by Carthage, under Hamilcar, Hasdrubal, and Hannibal, about 237–219 B. C. The period of Roman conquest (under the Scipios, Cato, Gracchus, etc., and ending with Carthage, Viriathus, Numantia, the Celtiberians, Sertorius, the Cantabri, etc.) extended from about 205 to 19 B. C. Spain was ravaged by Vandals, Suevi, and Alani in 409 A. D. A West-Gothic kingdom was established in 418, and overthrown by the Saracens in 711, and the Omniad caliphate was established at Cordova in 756. An invasion by Charles the Great led to the foundation of the "Spanish Mark." The Omniad dynasty ended in 1031. Christian kingdoms were founded—that of Asturias (later Leon) in the 8th century, Navarre in the 9th century, Castile in 1035, and Aragon in 1035. Toledo was taken from the Moors by Castile at the close of the 11th century. The Almoravides had a realm in Spain in the 11th and 12th centuries; the Almohades in the 12th and 13th centuries. Castile and Aragon were united in 1479. Granada was taken from the Moors in 1492. Spain reached its greatest power in the 16th century. The Hapsburg dynasty ruled from 1516 to 1700, when the Bourbons succeeded them. The throne was usurped by Joseph Bonaparte in 1808. The Peninsular war lasted from 1808 to 1814. Ferdinand VII. was restored to the throne with British help in 1813. The constitutional system was established in 1820. The first Carlist war was carried on from 1833 to 1840. Isabella was dethroned in 1868, and Amadeus reigned 1870–73. The republic formed in 1873 was overthrown and the Bourbons were restored in 1875. There was a second Carlist war 1872–76. The foreign possessions of Spain are Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Marianes, Ladrones, etc., and small possessions in western Africa. Area, 197,670 square miles. Population (1887), 17,550,246.

Spalatin (spā'la-tēn'), Georg (originally Burckhard). Born at Spalt, Bavaria, Jan. 17, 1484; died Jan. 16, 1545. A noted German divine, formerly a friend of Luther. He was in the diplomatic and other service of Frederick the Wise, elector of Saxony, and his successors. He wrote various historical works.

Spalato (spä-lä'tō), or Spalatro (spä-lä'trō). [From L. palatium, palace (the palace of Diocletian); Slav. Split.] A seaport in Dalmatia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Adriatic in lat. 43° 30′ N., long. 16° 27′ E., near the site of the ancient Salona. It has the largest trade in Dalmatia. It is noted for its Roman antiquities, especially for the ruins of the palace of Diocletian, built about 300, a huge aggregation of highly ornamented structures inclosed by a fortified wall forming approximately a rectangle of 695 by 700 feet. Streets connecting the great gates in the middle of each side divide the whole into 4 blocks. The present spacious arcaded Piazza del Duomo is the great court of the palace, on the south side of which are vestibule, atrium, and remains of a beautiful series of rooms. Flanking the great courts are areas containing the imperial mausoleum (now the cathedral) and a temple of Æsculapius. The arches of the great court are of importance in architecture, as the earliest which can be precisely dated that spring directly from columns without the intervention of an entablature. This marks the development from Roman architecture of the germ of the medieval. When Salona was destroyed by the Avars, about 639, inmates from that place took refuge in the ruins of the palace. Population (1880), communne, 22,755.

Fast by the bay, with the high mountain at his back, with the lower hills on each side of him, Diocletian built his villa, his palace, of Salona. The plunder is mine, the name which savoured of the Rome which Diocletian had forsaken, clave to the spot, and the city which in after ages grew up within the palatium of Diocletian still bears the name of Spalato. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 44.

Spanish Main, The. A name applied, somewhat vaguely, to the northern coast of South America, from the mouth of the Orinoco westward. Sometimes it included the Isthmus of Panama and Central America, or all the continental lands bordering on the Caribbean Sea. Sometimes it included the islands. The term was probably derived from the Spanish Tierra Firme, or Costa Firme, used in the 16th century for the continental portion of Spanish America, in contradistinction to the islands. In a more restricted sense for the Isthmus. Many modern writers appear to suppose that the Spanish Main was the Caribbean Sea.

Spanish Mark, The. A Frankish possession, conquered by Charles the Great, situated in the northeastern extremity of Spain. It was ruled by counts of Barcelona, and became merged in Catalonia and finally in Aragon.

Spanish Molière, The. Moratin.

Spanish Succession, War of the. A war arising out of disputes about the succession to Spain on the death of Charles II., fought 1701–14 between the emperor and the naval powers on the one hand, and France and its allies on the other. The question of the succession settled the various subject-matters in issue between the Hapsburg dynasty (ex-ruler in Spain) on the death of Charles II., as it nearly did the balance of power in Europe. Those three claimants were Louis XIV. of France (the nearest legitimate male heir), the dauphin (Louis XIV.'s son), and the Archduke Charles (second son of the emperor Leopold I.). Charles II. had by his will made Philip (Louis XIV.'s grandson) heir to the Spanish possessions, to be united to France if possible, but if not, to the Austrian monarchy. Leopold I. set forth his claim on behalf of his second son Charles, while Louis stated his in behalf of his grandson Philip; and Austria, England, and Holland were ready to support Charles. Louis's acceptance of the will, which made Philip king of Spain, was communicated in Sept., 1700, to the courts of Europe by the envoys of Philip. Louis's acceptance of the will was followed by Portugal, which, on the 16th of May, 1701, joined the Grand Alliance. Louis's Spanish grandson was soon established on Spanish soil with Louis' full help. The most conspicuous leaders of the Grand Alliance were the English general Marlborough, the Austrian general Prince Eugene, and Heinsius, pensionary of Holland. The seat of the war was principally in the Netherlands and Germany. The decisive victories of Marlborough and Eugene at Blenheim, Aug. 13, 1704, and at Ramillies, May 23, 1706, and Eugene and Marlborough's defeat of Boufflers and Villeroi at Malplaquet, Sept. 11, 1709. The death of the emperor Joseph, the eldest son and successor of Leopold I., in 1711, placed Charles on the imperial throne, thus removing the chief obstacle to the recognition of Philip. Louis (the electoral prince of Bavaria) having died in 1699, Philip V. was recognized by the Treaty of Utrecht (which was in 1713) and that of Rastatt and Baden in 1714, 1700 as king of Spain and the Indies, and Charles as king of Spain under the title of Philip V.

Louis XIV. and the Emperor Leopold each the son of an emperor—Ferdinand III. and Ferdinand II. respectively—but Anne of Austria and Maria Theresa, who married into the house of Hapsburg, were the daughters of Maria Anna and Margaret Theresa, who married into the house of Bourbon. The son and grandson of Louis XIV. had renounced their succession to the throne of Spain; Leopold's son Maria Anna, and to those of the descendants of Maria Theresa who had married French princes of Margaret Theresa. Leopold the emperor, was the person in the nearest line of Maria Theresa, but the Spanish cortes had not been consulted on the succession. Leopold was no doubt encouraged by the fact that the dowry of the infanta not having been paid . . . Dicey, History of France, p. 449.

Spanish Tragedy, The, or Hieronimo (jer-on-i-mō) is Mad Again. A play by Thomas Kyd, the earliest known of modern plays usually called "The First Part of Jeronimo." It was published in 1592, and its hero was adapted by Johnson. See Jeronimo.

Spanker (spang'ker), Lady Gay. A brilliant character in Dion Boucicault's comedy "London Assurance." She is devoted to horses and hunting, and keeps the whipcord of her neck little husband, Bobby Spanker.

Sparagus Garden, The, or Tom Hoyden of Taunton Dean. A comedy by Brome, acted in 1635 and printed in 1640.

Sparkish (spär'kish). A character in Wycherley's "Country Wife." He is the original of Congreve's Tattle.

The character of Sparkish is quite new, and admirably hit off. He is an unjealous and suffocating coxcomb: a pretender to wit and letters, without common understanding, or the use of his senses. Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 101.

Sparks (spärks), Jared. Born at Willington, Conn., May 10, 1789; died at Cambridge, Mass., March 14, 1866. An American historian. He graduated at Harvard in 1815, and was a Unitarian clergyman. He was pastor of a church in Baltimore 1819–23; was editor of the North American Review 1824–30; was professor of history at Harvard 1839–49, and was president of Harvard 1849–53. He was the founder of the Library of the American Almanac and Repository of useful Knowledge (Boston, 1826–61). Among other edited works are "The Writings of George Washington" (1834–37), "The Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution" (1829–30), "Writings of Benjamin Franklin" (1840), "Life of the Author, Travels, Indictment, and contemporaries of the American Revolution" (1839–40).

Sparta (spär'tä), or Lacedæmon (las-e-dē'mon). [Gr. Σπάρτη, Λακεδαίμων.] An ancient city of Laconia, however, subjugated by the Dorians or Heraclidæ. It was the leading city of Greece after the battle of Leuctra, 371 B. C., and was the leading state of Greece in the 5th century B. C. It was the seat of aristocratic government; took a leading part in the Persian war (with Athens); and was the head of the Peloponnesian league. Its constitution was ascribed to Lycurgus, and was peculiar. It was noted for its severe discipline and for its military spirit. It passed into Roman rule 146 B. C.

Spartacus (spär'ta-kus). Killed 71 B. C. A Thracian who became a gladiator, and headed a revolt of gladiators and slaves in Italy in 73 B. C., and routed several Roman armies, but was ultimately defeated by Crassus on the Silarus, and slain.

Spasmodic School, The. A name given collectively to various 19th-century writers, on account of their alleged unnatural style: among them were Gerald Massey, Sydney Dobell, Bailey, Gilfillan, Alexander Smith, and others.

It sacrificed to lucking perception and synthesis, and mistaking the material heap to poetic itself, aimed at the production of quotable passages—and animated their verse with exclamation-marked imagery, gushing diction, interjections, and that mockery of passion which is but surface-deep. Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 262.

Specie Circular, The. In United States history, an order by the secretary of the treasury, July 11, 1836, which directed that payment for public lands should be made to government agents in gold and silver only (except in certain cases in Virginia). It was designed to check speculative purchases of public lands.

Spectator (spek-tā'tor). The. An English periodical, published daily from March 1, 1711, to Dec. 6, 1712. It comprised 555 numbers, of which 274 were by Addison ("Sir Roger de Coverley" papers, critiques on "Paradise Lost," etc.), 236 by Steele, 1 by Pope ("The Messiah," No. 378), and 10 by Hughes. Eustace Budgell also contributed to it. Addison called Sir Roger de Coverley in No. 517, "that nobody else might murder him." It was revived in 1714.

Specter of the Brocken. See Brocken.

Speculum Salutis (spek'ū-lum sa-lū'tis), or Speculum Humanæ Salvationis (spek'ū-lum hū-mā'nē sal-vā-tō'nis). [L., mirror of salvation, or 'man's salvation.'] An early book in Latin rime, in 45 chapters. It tells the incidents of the Bible story from the fall of Lucifer to the redemption. There are many extant copies and as the 12th century, the most great interest attaches to it as an early work of printing. The earliest date which can be assigned to the printed book is 1467.

The "Speculum" was printed at different times and places during the fifteenth century, but the copies of greatest value are those which belong to large correlated editions—two in Latin and two in Dutch—all without date, name, or place of printer. In these four editions the illustrations are obviously impressions from one set of blocks, but each edition exhibits some new peculiarity in the shape or disposition of the letters. Those who favor the theory of the invention of type-printing in Holland maintain that these letters are the impressions of the first movable types, and that the curious workmanship of the book marks the development of printing at the great turning-point in its progress when it was passing from xylography to typography. De Vinne, Invention of Printing, p. 269.

Spedding (sped'ing), James. Born at Mirehouse, near Bassenthwaite, June, 1808; died, from an injury, at St. George's Hospital, London, March 9, 1881. An English editor of Bacon. He entered Cambridge (Trinity College) in 1827, from 1857 to 1861 was a clerk in the Colonial Office, and in 1843 was private secretary of Lord Ashburton in America. From 1857 to 1874 he published "Works, Life, and Letters of Bacon." In 1878 he published an "Account of the Life and Times of Bacon," and in 1881 "Studies in English History," etc.

Speed (spēd). Servant of Valentine, in Shakspere's "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Speed (spēd), John. Born at Farrington, Cheshire, 1542; died at London, July 28, 1629. An English antiquary. He wrote a "History of Great Britain under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans" (1611) and "Theater of the Empire of Great Britain" (1611).

Speed the Plough. A comedy by Thomas Morton, produced in 1798.

Speedwell (spēd'wel). A ship of about 60 tons burden, bought and fitted out in Holland, which sailed from Southampton with the Mayflower in 1615 for New England. She was sent back from Plymouth, England, owing to a series of mishaps, and those of the "pilgrims" who were disheartened turned back with her.

After taking a subordinate service in India he accompanied Sir R. Burton to discover certain African lakes (1854), and crossed the mountain-watershed from Zanzibar over Victoria Nyanza and down the Nile to Egypt (1860–1863). He published "Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile" (1863).

Spelman (spel'man), Sir Henry. Born at Congham, England, 1562; died at London, 1641. An English antiquary. He wrote "Glossarium Archäiologicum" (1626; completed 1664), "Concilia, etc." (1639; completed 1664), "Reliquiæ" (1698).

Spence (spens). Joseph. Born at Kingsclere, Hampshire, April 25, 1699; drowned at Byfleet, Surrey, Aug. 20, 1768. An English critic. His chief works are an "Essay on Pope's Translation of Homer" (1727), "Polymetis, etc." (a work on Roman art and poetry, 1747), and a volume of anecdotes, observations, and characters of books and men (an edition by Malone and one by Samuel Weller Singer were published in 1820, on the same day).

Spence, William. Born 1783; died at London, Jan. 6, 1860. An English entomologist. He collaborated with Kirby in his "Introduction to Entomology."

Spencer, Cape. A cape at the southern extremity of Yorke Peninsula, South Australia.

Spencer, Charles, third Earl of Sunderland. Born about 1674; died April 19, 1722. An English politician, son of the second Earl of Sunderland. He was envoy to Vienna in 1706; secretary of state 1706–10; lord lieutenant of Ireland 1714–15; lord privy seal 1715–17; secretary of state 1717–18; and first lord of the treasury and prime minister 1718–21. He was involved in the South Sea scheme.

Spencer, George John, second Earl Spencer. Born Sept. 1, 1758; died Nov. 10, 1834. An English bibliophile and politician. He collected a very valuable library, described in "Bibliotheca Spenceriana" (1814) by Dibdin.

Spencer, Herbert. Born at Derby, April 27, 1820. A celebrated English philosopher, founder of the system named by himself the synthetic philosophy. He was educated by his father, a schoolmaster at Derby, and by his uncle, the Rev. Thomas Spencer, rector of Hinton. He was articled to a civil engineer in 1837, but soon abandoned engineering and devoted himself to literature. He was assistant editor of the "Economist" 1848–53, and in 1882 visited the United States, delivering seven a number of lectures. His first effort in the field of general literature (he had previously published a number of professional papers in the "Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal") was a series of letters to the "Nonconformist" on "The Proper Sphere of Government," which appeared in 1842 and was reprinted in pamphlet form in the following year. In 1855 (four years before Buckle published the first volume of "History of Civilization") he published his "Principles of Psychology," which is based on the principle of evolution. In 1860 he issued a prospectus of his "System of Synthetic Philosophy," in which, beginning with the first principles of knowledge, he proposed to trace the progress of evolution in life, mind, society, and morals. Other publications: "Social Statics, or the Conditions Essential to Human Happiness Specified, etc." (1850), "Over-Legislation" (1854), "The Principles of Psychology" (1855), "Part I.: The Data of Psychology" (1870), an abridgment of the two (so was published later (1870–72): see below), "Essays (1857–63–74–74), "Education: Intellectual, Moral, and Physical" (1861), "Classification of the Sciences" (1864), "Illustrations of Universal Progress" (1864), "The Study of Sociology" (1873), "Descriptive Sociology" (1874–82; compiled under his direction by Scotch scholars), "Various Fragments" (1876), "Progress: its Law and Course" (1881) "The Philosophy of Style" (1882), "The Man versus the State" (1884), "The Nebular Hypothesis" (reprinted from "Westminster Review" for "Nineteenth Century"), etc. There are annuals from 1860 under the general title "A System of Synthetic Philosophy" was published as follows: Vol. I. "First Principles" (1862; 6th ed. 1887); Vols. II., III. "The Principles of Biology" (1865–67); Vols. IV., V., "The Principles of Psychology" (1870–72); Vols. VI., VII., VIII., "The Principles of Sociology" (1877–96). The three bulkies "Part I. Data of Sociology," "The Inductions of Sociology," and "The Domestic Relations" vol. ii includes "Ceremonial Institutions" (1879), "Political Institutions" (1882), and "Ecclesiastical Institutions" (1885); vol. iii is not yet (1894) published); Vols. IX., X., "The Principles of Morality or of Ethics" (1879–92), "The Data of Ethics" (1879), "The Inductions of Ethics" (1892), and "Ethics of Individual Life" (1892), and vol. ii contains "Justice" (1891) and "Negative Beneficence and Positive Beneficence" (1893).

Spencer, Robert, second Earl of Sunderland. Born 1640; died at Althorp, Northamptonshire, Sept. 28, 1702. An English politician. He succeeded to the earldom in 1643; served as ambassador at several courts under Charles II.; was secretary of state 1679–81; became secretary again about 1682; and continued in office under James II. He was made lord chamberlain and lord justice by William III., whom he was said to have brought over, and served offices before his accession. He retired to private life in 1697.

Spencer, John Charles, third Earl Spencer: known as Viscount Althorp previous to his accession to the earldom. Born at London, May 20, 1782; died at Wiseton Hall, Nottinghamshire, Oct. 1, 1845. An English statesman, son of the second Earl Spencer: leader of the Whig opposition in the House of Commons under George III. He was chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons 1830–34, and was largely instrumental in procuring the passage of the Reform Bill. He became Earl Spencer in 1834.

Spencer, John Poyntz, fifth Earl Spencer. Born Oct. 27, 1835. An English politician, nephew of the third Earl Spencer. He was lord lieutenant of Ireland 1868–74 and 1882–85, and president of the council 1880–82 and 1886.

Spens (spens), Sir Patrick. The subject of a Scottish ballad: said to have been wrecked in the Orkneys.

Spenser (spen'sėr), Edmund, Born at London about 1552; died at London, Jan. 13, 1599. A celebrated English poet. He was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School, London, and at Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1569–76, where he associated with Gabriel Harvey, Edward Kirke, and other men of note. Afterward he became intimate with Sir Philip Sidney and Leicester, who did much for him. He was sent abroad by Leicester in 1579, and went in 1580 as secretary with Lord Grey de Wilton to Ireland to assist in suppressing Desmond's rebellion, and became extremely unpopular. In the redistribution of Munster he became an undertaker for the settlement of about 3,000 acres of land, with Kilcolman Castle, County Cork, for his chief residence. He held various government undertaking his security. In 1581 he was made a clerk of the Irish court of chancery, and in 1588 clerk to the council of Munster. In the "View of the State of Ireland" (written about 1586, but not published till 1633) Spenser advocates the most oppressive measures, little short of wholesale depopulation. At the suggestion of Sir Walter Raleigh, whom he met at the Fort del Ore in 1580, he returned to London in 1589 with the first three books of the "Faerie Queene," which were entered at Stationers' Hall, Dec., 1589, and published in 1590. In 1591 he returned, already famous, to Kilcolman Castle, and wrote "Colin Clout 's Come Home Again" (published in 1595). His house was burned by Irish rebels in 1598, and he fled with his family to Cork, and then went to London, where about four weeks later he died. His first poems were published in a small volume entitled "The Shepheardes Calender" (1579), and to have been translations from Bellay and Petrarch, but this has been disputed. He also wrote "The Shepheards Calender" (1579), "The Faerie Queene" (1590–96) (see these entries), "Daphnaida" (1591), "Complaints" (1591; including "Tears of the Muses," "Mother Hubbard's Tale," etc.), "Epithalamion" and "Amoretti" (1595), "Astrophel," "Prothalamion," "Four Hymns" (1596), etc.

Speransky, or Speranski (spā-rän'skē), Count Mikhail. Born in the government of Vladimir, Jan. 1, 1772; died at St. Petersburg, Feb. 11, 1839. A Russian statesman. He became state secretary in 1801, colleague of the minister of justice in 1808, and secretary of the empire in 1809. He was in banishment 1812–16. From 1819 to 1821 he was governor-general of Siberia. He directed the compilation of the Russian laws.

Spey (spā). A river in Scotland which rises in Inverness, forms part of the boundary between Elgin and Banff, and flows into the North Sea 8 miles east-northeast of Elgin. It has valuable salmon-fisheries. Length, about 100 miles.

Speyer, or Speier (spī'er or spīr), E. Spires (spīrz), F. Spire (spēr). [L. Spira.] The capital of the Rhine Palatinate, Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Speierbach and Rhine, in lat. 49° 19′ N., long. 8° 26′ E. Its cathedral is a Romanesque structure, founded in 1030 and completed in 1061, and still, despite fires and restorations, retaining in great part its original form. The three portals of the west end open into a narthex called the Kaiser-Halle, from which one great recessed and sculptured door leads into the nave. Over the west end rise two bold square towers. The transepts are at the east end, immediately in front of the semicircular apse, and the crossing is covered with a fine dome. The church is surrounded with open arcading beneath the roof. The interior produces a striking effect of great size; it is adorned with excellent modern frescos of Old and New Testament subjects, and other works mediæval and modern. The interesting crypt is wholly of the early 11th century. Its dimensions are 440 by 125 feet; length of transepts, 180; height of vaulting, 105; width of nave, 45. Speyer is the Roman Noviomagus Nemetum. It became the seat of a bishopric about 610 A. D.; became a free imperial city 1294; and was long the seat of the imperial chamber. It was burned by the French in 1689. The chief diets of Speyer were those of 1526 and 1529: the latter condemned the Reformation, and the "Protestation" then made by the Reformers gave rise to the name "Protestant." Population (1890), 15,385.

Speyerbach (spī'er-bäkh). A small river which joins the Rhine at Speyer, on its banks, Nov. 15, 1703, the French (18,000) under Tallard defeated a German army (12,000) under the Count of Nassau-Weilburg.

Spezia, or Spezzia (spet'sē-ä). A seaport in the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Gulf of Spezia, in lat. (of lighthouse) 44° 4′ N., long. 9° 51′ E., the ancient Portus Lunæ or Haliussa (?). It is one of the chief Italian naval stations, has the largest and best harbor in Italy, and has a marine arsenal, docks, and extensive ship-building works. It is near the site of the ancient Roman Luna. Population, 19,864.

Spezia, Gulf of. A small arm of the Mediterranean, near Spezia.

Spezzia, or Spetzia (spet'sē-ä). 1. An island belonging to Argolis, Greece, situated at the entrance to the Gulf of Nauplia, 28 miles southeast of Nauplia. Length, 5 miles. —2. A seaport on the island of Spezzia.

Sphacteria (sfak-tē'ri-ä). [Gr. Σφακτηρία.] A small island near Navarino, off the coast of Messenia, Greece: the modern Sphagia. Here, 425 B. C., the Spartans were blockaded by the Athenians, and were compelled by Cleon to surrender.

Spheres of Influence. Large areas of land in Africa recognized as under the control of European powers. The phrase came into use about 1885. It designates the region which may be occupied and developed by the power for which it is named. The European spheres of influence in Africa comprise a large part of the continent. See Brit. (British), Fr. (French), Port. (Portuguese), German Southwest Africa, and Kongo, French.

Sphinx, Temple of the. A structure (incorrectly called a temple) lying a short distance southeast of the Sphinx at Gizeh. It is in fact a family mausoleum of Khafra or Chephren, the builder of the second Pyramid, and is connected with the Temple of the Second Pyramid by a rock-cut passage. Here was found the colossal statue of Khafra now in the Gizeh Museum. The temple is built of splendid blocks of red granite and alabaster. It consists of a passage descending to an open three-aisled area with square piers and lintels, and two cross-passages or transepts toward the east. At the end of the first transept there is a small chamber with niches for mummies, in two tiers, and similar chambers open from the entrance passage.

Sphinx (sfingks), The. A celebrated figure at Gizeh, Egypt, about a quarter of a mile southeast of the Third Pyramid. According to general archæological opinion it is older than any of the pyramids. It consists of an enormous figure of a crouching sphinx of the usual Egyptian type, hewn from the natural rock, and the flanks and paws built up with masonry. The body is 140 feet long; the head measures about 30 feet from the top of the forehead to the chin, and is 14 wide. Except the head and shoulders, the figure is with difficulty generally been buried in the desert sand. The face, despite the mutilation of eyes and nose due to Mohammedan fanaticism, impresses by its calm dignity. The head-dress extends broadly outward on each side. A long rock-cut passage composed of inclined plane and steps leads down in front to the extended fore-paws of the sphinx, which are 50 feet long and 12 broad with masonry. Between the paws were found an altar, a crouching lion with fragments of others, and 3 large inscribed tablets, one, 14 feet high, against the Sphinx's breast, and the two others extending from it on each side, thus forming a sort of shrine. The Sphinx was a local personification of the sun-god. No interior chamber has been discovered.

To this day, the most ancient statue known is a colossus —namely, the Great Sphinx of Gizeh. It was already in existence in the time of Khoofoo (Cheops), and perhaps we should not be far wrong if we ventured to ascribe it to the generations before him called in the pyramid inscriptions "the Servants of Horus." Hewn in the living rock at the extreme verge of the Libyan plateau, it seems, as the representative of Horus, to spread its head in order to be the first to catch sight of his father, Ra, the rising sun, across the valley. For centuries the sands have buried it to the chin, yet without protecting it from ruin. Its battered body preserves but the general form of a lion's body. The paws and breast, restored by the Ptolemies and the Cæsars, retain but a part of the stone facing with which they were then clothed in order to mask the ravages of time. The lower part of the head-dress has fallen, and the diminished neck looks too slender to sustain the enormous weight of the head. The nose and beard have been broken off by fanatics, and the red hue which formerly enlivened the features is almost wholly effaced. And yet, notwithstanding its fallen fortunes, the monster preserves an expression of sovereign strength and greatness. The eyes gaze out afar with a look of intense and profound thoughtfulness; the mouth still wears a smile; the whole countenance is informed with power and repose.

Spica (spī'kä). A very white star of magnitude 1.2, the sixteenth in order of brightness in the heavens, a Virginis, situated in the left hand of the Virgin.

Staël-Holstein (stäl-hol'stīn; F. pron. stäl'-ol-stän'). Anne Louise Germaine Necker, Baronne de; commonly called Madame de Staël. Born at Paris, April 22, 1766; died there, July 14, 1817. A celebrated French writer. She was the daughter of Necker, the minister of finance under Louis XVI. Already as a child she enjoyed in her own home the society of men like Buffon, Marmontel, Grimm, and Gibbon, who were all personal friends of her father, and who stimulated her to mental activity. She especially admired J. J. Rousseau, and devoted to him her first serious essay, "Lettres sur le caractère et les écrits de J. J. Rousseau" (1788). In 1786 she was married to the Baron of Staël-Holstein, ambassador from Sweden to France: he died in 1802. Madame de Staël spent a couple of years in Germany (1803–4), and met both there she established at Weimar. In Jan., 1805, she took a short trip to Italy. In 1800 she published one of her best works, "De la Littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales." In 1807 appeared her novel "Delphine," and in 1807 "Corinne." She returned to Germany in 1808 to finish "De l'Allemagne," her best-known work. The first edition of this work was destroyed, presumably at the instigation of Napoleon, who at all times evinced a spirit of petty enmity toward the great writer. He was furthermore the cause of her exile from France (1803–14), when she took refuge in Switzerland, and later in England, Sweden, Russia, and Germany. Her "Considérations sur la révolution française" (1818) and other posthumous works by her are "Dix années d'exil" and "Essais dramatiques" (1821), and finally her "Œuvres inédites" (1820).

[So called, it is said, because the pool was originally ornamented with stars; perhaps from Heb. shtar, a document, the name of the financial documents executed between the exchequer of the Jews (who farmed the British revenues) and the early kings of England.] In English history, a court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster. It was constituted in view of offenses and controversies not frequent at the royal court, or affecting the interests of the crown, such as maintenance, fraud, libel, conspiracy, or riots resulting from faction or oppression, but freely took jurisdiction of other crimes and misdemeanors and administered justice by arbitrary authority instead of according to the common law. Such a jurisdiction was exercised at least as early as the reign of Henry VI., the tribunal then consisting of the privy council. A statute of 3 Henry VII. authorized a committee of the council to exercise such a jurisdiction, and this tribunal grew in power (although successive statutes from the time of Edward IV. were enacted to restrain it) until it fell into disuse in the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. In 31 Henry VIII., a statute declared that the king's proclamations should have the force of law, and that offenders might be punished by the ordinary members of the council sitting with certain bishops and judges "in the Star Chamber or elsewhere." In 1640 the court of Star Chamber was abolished by an act of 16 Charles I., reciting that "the reasons and motives inducing the erection and continuance of the court [of Star Chamber] do now cease."

Stobæus (stō-bē'us), Joannes. Born at Stobi, Macedonia: lived probably about the 5th century A. D. A Greek writer, author of an anthology.

Among the Byzantine writers to whom we are indebted for precious relics of the older Greek authors, perhaps the earliest, and certainly not the least important, is John of Stobi in Macedonia, generally known as Stobæus. His personal existence has vanished from all records, and even his date is determined rather by inference than by testimony. He mentions Hierocles, who flourished about the middle of the 5th century, and does not name any subsequent writer. It is therefore concluded that he lived soon after that author.

Stoics (stō'iks). [Formerly also Stoick; F. stoïque, Pg. estoico, It. stoico, Pl. stoici, from L. stoicus, from Gr. στοϊκός, pertaining to a porch or portico, specifically pertaining to that called Στοὰ Ποικίλη, the Painted Porch in the Agora at Athens, and to the school of philosophy founded by Zeno, who frequented this porch.] Disciples of the philosopher Zeno, who founded a sect about 308 B. C. It taught that men should live free from passions, unmoved by pleasure and sorrow, without complaint to the unavoidable necessity by which all things are governed. The stoics are proverbially known for their firmness and independence of character. Their system attained a wide-spread influence among the noblest spirits of antiquity, especially among the Romans. Their system appears to have been an attempt to reconcile a theological pantheism and a materialist psychology with a logic which seeks the foundations of knowledge in the representations or perceptions of the senses, and a morality which claims as its first principle the absolute freedom of the human will. The Stoics teach that whatever is real is material; that matter and force are the two ultimate principles; and that neither is the result notunderstood as formed, though capable of receiving all motions and all forms. Force is the active moving, and molding principle, and is inseparably joined with matter. The working force in the universe is God, whose existence is a new thinking being is proved by the beauty and adaptation of the world. The supreme end of life, or the highest good is virtue: that is, life conformed to nature, the agreement of human conduct with the all-controlling law or virtue—or of the human with the divine will; not contemplation, but action, is the supreme problem for man; virtue is sufficient for happiness, but happiness or pleasure should never be made the end of human endeavor. The wise man alone attains to the complete performance of his duty; he is without passion, although not without feeling. He is not indifferent to pleasure and pain, but he does not seek the one or shun the other. He is not without desires, but he controls and subdues them. He is not without emotion, but he does not feel sorrow. He is not without knowledge, but he does not believe. He is not without opinion, but he does not form it rashly. He is not without speech, but he does not speak unadvisedly. He is not without wealth, but he does not set his heart upon it. He is not without beauty, but he does not covet it. He is not without reputation, but he does not seek it. He is not without friends, but he does not desire them. He is not without pleasure, but he does not indulge in it. He is not without pain, but he does not fear it. He is not without death, but he does not dread it. He is not without life, but he does not love it. He is not without time, but he does not waste it. He is not without eternity, but he does not look beyond it. He is not without God, but he does not worship Him. He is not without the world, but he does not live for it. He is not without himself, but he does not live for himself. He is not without others, but he does not live for others. He is not without nature, but he does not live for nature. He is not without art, but he does not live for art. He is not without science, but he does not live for science. He is not without philosophy, but he does not live for philosophy. He is not without religion, but he does not live for religion. He is not without virtue, but he does not live for virtue. He is not without vice, but he does not live for vice. He is not without sin, but he does not live for sin. He is not without grace, but he does not live for grace. He is not without faith, but he does not live for faith. He is not without hope, but he does not live for hope. He is not without charity, but he does not live for charity. He is not without love, but he does not live for love. He is not without life, but he does not live for life. He is not without death, but he does not live for death. He is not without God, but he does not live for God

Stonehenge (stōn'henj). A celebrated prehistoric monument in Salisbury Plain, Wiltshire, England, 8 miles north of Salisbury. The original plan seems to have included two concentric circles of upright stones (some of which are now fallen), but the middle there is a slab called the altar. Seventeen stones of the outer circle (the largest two lintel-stones standing, in part connected by lintels) are resting on their tops. In the vicinity are many barrows and a racecourse (? circus.)

> We cannot leave this point without alluding to the question, whose temple Stonehenge was, or whose it chiefly was. After giving it all the attention we can, we have come to the conclusion that we cannot do better than follow the story of Geoffrey, which makes Stonehenge the work of Merlin Ambrys, commanded to carry the Giants which I interpret to mean that the temple belonged to the Celtic Zeus, whose local legendary title we have in Merlin. It would be hasty, to look for any direct argument for or against such an hypothesis: there is only one test that suits the facts of the case, and helps to understand others of a somewhat similar nature. What sort of a temple could have been more appropriate for the primeval god of light and of the luminous heavens than a specimen, open at the closure of a circular form, like Stonehenge? Nor do I see any objection to the other, that Stonehenge was the original of the famous temple of Apollo in the island of the Hyperboreans, the stories about which were based in the first instance on the actual remains of Pythæus's travels.

He published "Sonetti, strambotti, epistole e capitoli," (1508), but is best remembered by his collection of novels called "Tredici piacevoli notti," drawn from many sources and published at Venice in two series in 1550 and 1554. Many editions were printed, and the stories formed a storehouse from which succeeding writers have obtained plots, etc. Shakspere and Molière are indebted to it, one of the stories is in Painter's "Palace of Pleasure," and there have been several French translations. The stories are told on separate nights by a party of ladies and gentlemen enjoying the cool air at Murano (Venice), and are frequently called "Straparola's Nights."

Strasburg (stras'bėrg), G. Strassburg (strās'bėrg), F. Strasbourg (strās-bör'). The capital of Alsace-Lorraine, situated at the junction of the Breusch and Ill, about 2 miles from the Rhine, in lat. 48° 35′ N., long. 7° 46′ E.: the Roman Argentoratum. It is a railway center, a fortress of the first class, an important strategic point. It has manufactures of beer, leather, tobacco, dyes, etc.; and exports beer, sausages, "fat liver pies," sauer-kraut, hops, etc. The cathedral is an interesting monument to the Middle Ages, begun in the 11th century, finished until the 15th. The west front and openwork tower and spire are famous: the front is very richly decorated with traceried windows and slender arcadings, and has fine sculptured portals and a splendid rose, but it bears little relation to the remainder of the edifice, far above which it rises in heavy square mass. The spire is 468 feet high. The 13th-century nave is 100 feet high, and excellent in design: the east end is of massive Romanesque, with an early crypt. The medieval glass is gorgeous in color, and the great astronomical clock (1842) is an artistic and scientific curiosity. The Church of St. Thomas is chiefly of the time of transition from Romanesque to Pointed, of massive and imposing architecture, and possesses good glass. It is chiefly remarkable, however, for the tomb of the Maréchal de Saxe, erected by Louis XV., and designed by Pigalle. The marshal appears in front, with a broken lance, mounted on a horse, and being led by death, a skeleton woman with hour-glass and dart. Behind the marshal's coffin, which is surrounded by the royal standards, kneels the king, with head bowed and hands clasped in prayer. The whole is surmounted by a group of the marshal's family. Population (1890), 112,504.

Strasburg, a village in Shenandoah County, Virginia, situated on the North Fork of the Shenandoah, 72 miles west of Washington. It was an important point in the Civil War. It was scene of the battle of Fisher's Hill, or Woodstock, Sept. 22, 1864.

He was educated at Tübingen and Berlin, and was "repetent" at the Theological Seminary and lecturer at the University of Tübingen 1832-35. He was deprived of his office on account of his "Leben Jesu," and resigned the position held in charge of the Gymnasium of Ludwigsburg; this however, he abandoned in 1836, and went to Stuttgart. In 1839 he was called as professor of dogmatics and church history to Zürich, but his appointment caused so much opposition that he was at once pensioned, and soon driven from the place. He lived thereafter at Stuttgart, Darmstadt, and elsewhere. He sought to prove that the gospel history is mythical in character. Among his works are "Das Leben Jesu" ("Life of Jesus," 1835), "Die christliche Glaubenslehre, etc." ("Christian Doctrine of Belief," 1840-41), biographies of Schubart (1849), Marklin (1851), Frischlin (1855), Ulrich von Hutten (1858-60), Reimarus (1862), Voltaire (1870), "Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk" (1864), "Der alte und der neue Glaube" ("The Old and the New Belief," 1872), and controversial works.

Styx (stiks). [Gr. Στύξ, the hateful.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus, and mother of Zeal, Victory, Power, and Strength. She first came to the aid of Zeus against the Titans, and as a reward he kept her children with him in Olympus, and made her the goddess by whom the most inviolable oaths were sworn. She was the goddess of the river Styx.

Styx, In Greek mythology, a mighty river, the tenth part of the water of Oceanus, which flows in the lower world. Any oath sworn by any of the gods in the name of the river was considered by thinking a cup of its water brought to him. If such an oath was violated, the guilty party was punished by being deprived of speech and breath for a year, and banished from the council of gods for nine years. The name was also given to a waterfall in Arcadia. See the extract.

Pausanias describes the terrible water as "a stream falling from a precipice, the liquids that the head ever beheld, and bursting itself upon a lofty rock, through which it passed and then fell into the Crathis" (VIII, xviii, § 2). Homer and Hesiod give similar descriptions. Colonel Leake ("Morea," ii, p. 160) seems to have discovered the waterfall intended, near Soles, where "two slender cascades of water fall perpendicularly over an immense precipice, and, after mingling for a time among a labyrinth of rocks, unite to form the torrent which, after passing the Kinkines, joins the river Akrata (Crathis). Superstitious feelings of dread still attach to the scene, which is considered to be of a peculiarly noxious character. Rawlinson, Herod., III. 457, note.

"Aglaura" was produced in 1637, "The Goblins" in 1638, "Brennoralt" in 1639. He was of the Scottish Covenanters began (1639), he raised a troop of 100 horse for the king. In Nov., 1640, he was elected member for Banbury. In May, 1641, he was arrested, 1641, he was implicated in a plot for the liberation of Strafford, was charged with high treason, and fled from England. He is best known from his minor poems.

Sucre (sō'krā), Antonio José de. Born at Cumaná, Venezuela, Feb. 3, 1793: died in the province of Pasto, New Granada, June 4, 1830. A Spanish-American general in the war for independence. He was a trusted lieutenant of Bolivar, and having thus distinguished himself on most decisive victories of the war—the battle of Pichincha (May 24, 1822), freed Quito or Ecuador; and that of Ayacucho (Dec. 9, 1824), which put an end to Spanish rule in South America. Sucre was awarded the title of grand marshal of Ayacucho, and was elected first president of Bolivia Oct. 3, 1826. He resigned in Sept., 1828, to prevent a war with Peru, the government of that country having demanded his removal as an adherent of Bolivar. Sucre went to Colombia, where he took command of the army then acting against Peru, defeated the Peruvians at Tarqui, near Cuenca, Feb. 28, 1829, and thus practically ended the war. He was president of the Colombian congress of 1829, and while returning to his home in Peru was assassinated, at the instigation, as was supposed, of his political enemies.

Sucre, or Chuquisaca (chō-kē-sä'kä). The official capital of Bolivia, situated near lat. 19° 5′ S. It contains a cathedral and several educational institutions. Originally it was the Indian village of Chuquisaca. The Spaniards called it La Plata de Chuquisaca, to imply La Plata, from the important silver mines of the vicinity. It was the capital of the old Spanish province of Charcas, whence it was also called Charcas. The official name Sucre was given when it became the capital of Bolivia in 1826. For many years La Paz has been the seat of government. Population, 20,000.

Suczawa (sö'chä'vä). A town in Bukowina, Austria-Hungary, situated on the river Sucza-wa 45 miles south by east of Czernowitz. Population (1890), commune, 10,221.

Sudan, or Soudan (sö-dän'), sometimes called Nigritia (ni-grish'iä). [Ar. Sûdan, the Blacks.] A vast region in Africa, with indefinite boundaries, including the territories from the Atlantic eastward to the Red Sea, and from the Sahara southward to the Guinea coast, the Kongo basin, and Abyssinia. The Egyptian Sudan, before the Mahdist revolt of 1882, comprised Darfur, Kordofan, Lower and Upper Nubia, Sennaar, the White Nile region and the Red Sea and Gulf of Aden territories. Its area was estimated at 950,000 square miles, and its population at 10,400,000. This region is now mainly divided between the Mahdists and the British and Italian spheres of influence. (See Spheres of Influence.) The central Sudan states are Bornu, Wadai, with the vassal states Kanem and Baghirmi. (See these names.) Bornu is apparently partly within the British sphere of influence, to which belong also, in western Sudan, Sokoto, Gando, etc. Adamawa apparently falls within the German Kamerun Hinterland. The rest of Sudan is in the French sphere of influence.

Sudani (sö-dä'nē). A dialect of Arabic spoken in the Sudan.

Sudbury (sud'bu-ri). A town in Suffolk and Essex, England, situated on the Stour 50 miles northeast of London. Population (1891), 7,059.

Sudeten (sö-de'ten). [G., 'Sudetic' Mountains.] A mountain system in Moravia, Austrian Silesia, Prussian Silesia, Bohemia, and Saxony. It extends from the Danube basin in Moravia to the gap of the Elbe near the Bohemian and Saxon frontier. Its chief divisions are the Isergebirge, Riesengebirge, Glatzer Mountains (Schneeberg, Reichensteiner Mountains, Eulengebirge, Adlergebirge, Habelschwerter Mountains, Heuscheuergebirge, Schweidnitzer Mountains), and Sudeten proper (Moravian Gesenke, Altvater Schneegebirge).

Sudini. See Æstii.

Sue (sü), Marie Joseph (best known as Eugène). Born at Paris, Dec. 10, 1804: died at Annecy, Savoy, Aug. 3, 1857. A celebrated French novelist. His sponsors were Prince Eugène Beauharnais and the empress Josephine; from the former he took the name Eugène, which he prefixed to Sue to form his nom de plume. After a short stay at the Lycée Bonaparte in Paris, he took up painting and then medicine, and wrote also a couple of plays. He began as a surgeon in the navy as a surgeon, falling heir to his father's large estate on his return to France in 1830. Chance led him to write his first novel, "Flick et Flock" (1831), and he was encouraged by its success to publish "Atar-Gull" (1831), "La salamandre" (1832), "La Coucaratcha" (1832–34), and "La vigie de Koat-Var" (1833). For the next subject-matter of all these works he drew largely upon his store of personal reminiscences and experiences. A great deal of sound information on naval matters is found embodied in Sue's "Histoire de la marine française" (1835–37). Stepping gradually into the general style of novel, he published "Arthur" (1838). "Le marquis de Létorière" (1839), "Mathilde" (1841). "Le morne au diable" (1842). In a more erudite strain he composed two historical novels, "Latreaumont" (1877) and "Jean Cavalier" (1840). He exercised a profound influence by the views to which he gave expression in "Les mystères de Paris" (1842–43), and in "Le Juif errant" (1844–45). A change of government drove him into exile in 1852, and he spent the remainder of his life in Annecy. In addition to the works mentioned above, he wrote a few plays and a number of novels, as "Kernock le pirate" (1830), "Cécile" (1835). "Delphat" (1839). "Deux histoires" (1840). "La commandeur de Malte" (1841). "Paula Monti" (1842). "Thérèse Dunoyer" (1842). "Martin, ou l'enfant trouvé" (1847). "Les sept péchés capitaux" (1847–54). "Les mystères du peuple" (1849–56). "Les mystères de l'amour" (1850). "La bonne aventure" (1851). "Fernand Duplessis" (1852). "La marquise d'Amalfi" (1853). "Gilbert et Gilberte" (1853). "La famille Jouffroy" (1854). "Les fils de famille" (1856). "Les secrets de l'oreiller" (1858), and "Les filles de Cam" (1860).

Suessiones (swes-i-ō'nēz). An ancient people of Gallia Belgica, allied to and situated near the Remi, in the vicinity of Soissons (named from them). They were subjugated by Julius Cæsar 57 B. C.

Suessula (swes'ū-lä). In ancient geography, a place in Campania, Italy, 13 miles northeast of Naples: the traditional scene of a Roman victory over the Samnites in the first Samnite war.

Suetonius (swē-tō'ni-us) (Caius Suetonius Tranquillus), Lived in the first part of the 2d century A. D. A Roman biographer and historian. He was private secretary of Hadrian about 119–121, and was a friend of the younger Pliny, whom he accompanied to Bithynia in 112. His chief work is "Lives of the Cæsars," which contains biographies (and anecdotical character) of the first twelve Cæsars, including Julius. It is important on account of its revelations concerning the private life of the emperors. Fragments of his "De grammaticis," and of other works, remain.

Suett (sū'et), Richard. Died in 1805. An English comedian, known as Dickey Suett. He first went on the stage at Drury Lane in 1780. Lamb says "Shakspere foresaw him when he framed the fools and jesters: they have all the true Suett stamp, a loose, shambling gait, a slippery tongue."

Suevi (swē'vī), L. (Cæsar) Suebi, (Pliny) Sueri, Gr. (Strabo) Σόηβοι (Jordanes) Σουάβοι.] The collective name of a German people mentioned by Cæsar, who describes them as the largest and most warlike of the German tribes. At the time of Tacitus the Suevi occupied all central Germany west of the Oder, from the confines of the Hermunduri, who alone interposed between them and the Baltic, to the Danube. The common name included the Semnones, Chatti, Hermunduri, Marcomanni, Quadi, and Juthungi, with many of which local appellations the common name interchanged. In the first half of the 5th century the Suevi, so called (possibly the Juthungi), appeared as neighbors and allies of the Alamanni, with whom they acted as one folk: either name may be used of the whole people. Together they were crushingly defeated by the Franks under Clovis. Subsequently the Suevi were settled about the head waters of the Danube, where their name is still preserved in Swabia (Schwaben). The Suevi who settled in Spanish Galicia in the 5th century were possibly the Semnones.

Suevicum (swē'vi-kum), Mare. [L., 'Suevic Sea.'] A Roman name of the Baltic Sea.

Suez (sō'ez or sō-ez'). A seaport of Egypt, situated at the head of the Gulf of Suez, and at the southern terminus of the Suez Canal, in lat. 29° 58′ N., long. 32° 32′ E.: the ancient Arsinoë, later Clysma and Kolzum. It was the terminus of an ancient canal. It was developed in recent times by the opening of the fresh-water canal (1863), which extended from Suez to Ismailia, and of the Suez Canal in 1869. It has harbors and quays. Population (1882), 10,920.

Suez, Gulf of. The northwestern arm of the Red Sea, bounding the Sinaitic peninsula on the west: the ancient Heroopolites Sinus.

Suez, Isthmus of. The isthmus which unites Asia and Africa, and separates the Mediterranean from the Red Sea: now intersected by the Suez Canal (which see).

Suez Canal. A ship-canal which connects the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. Napoleon I. entertained the idea of building a maritime canal between these two bodies of water, but abandoned it in consequence of a report by his engineer Lepère (1799), which placed the surface of the Red Sea nearly 30 feet higher than that of the Mediterranean. This mistake was corrected by British officers in 1841, and in 1847 Ferdinand de Lesseps began a thorough investigation of the isthmus. With the consent of the Khedive of Egypt and the Porte he organized the Universal Company of the Maritime Suez Canal in 1858, half the capital of which was raised by public subscription in Europe (chiefly in France), the other half by the khedive. Work began April 25, 1859, and Nov. 16, 1869, the canal was opened for navigation. Its cost about 320,000,000. It is 100 miles long, traversing Lake Menzaleh, Lake Timsah, and the Bitter Lakes, and was originally from 150 to 300 feet wide at the water-surface, and 72 at the bottom, with a minimum depth of 26 feet: but has since (1886-90) been deepened to 28 feet and considerably widened. The original capital of the company consisted of 400,000 shares of 500 each (besides 100,000 founders' shares), of which 176,662 belonged to the khedive and were purchased by the British government in 1875. The following table shows the increase in the number of vessels passing through the canal and the receipts of the company:

Year	Steamers	Tonnage	Receipts

Sufed Koh (sō-fed' kō). A peak of the Himalaya, in the Panjab, India, 19,839 feet in height.

Sugambri or -gam'bri), also Sigambri (si-gam'bri or Sicambri (si-kam'bri). [L. (Cæsar) Sigambri, (Tacitus) Sugambri, Gr. (Strabo) Σούγαμβροι.] A German tribe, first mentioned by Cæsar, in whose time they were situated on the right bank of the lower Rhine, north of the Ubii, on both sides of the Ruhr. By Tiberius they were subjected in part to Rome and a large body of them was settled on the opposite side of the Rhine, where they afterward appear as Gugerni. Those left in the old home are probably to be identified with the Marsi.

Sugden (sug'den), Edward Burtenshaw, first Baron Saint Leonards. Born at London, Feb. 1781; died at Thames Dellon, Jan. 29, 1875. An English statesman and jurist. He was solicitor-general 1829–30; lord chancellor of Ireland 1834–1835 and 1841–46; and was created Lord St. Leonards, and appointed lord high chancellor of England in Lord Derby's first administration in 1852. He wrote "Law of Venders and Purchasers" (1805), "Powers" (1808), "Law of Property as Administered by the House of Lords" (1849), and other legal treatises.

Suhrab (modern Pers. pron. sō-hrāb'; earlier, following the Arabic, so-hrāb'). In the Shahnamah, the son of Rustam by Tahmimah. Rustam kills Suhrab without knowing that he is his son. (See Rustum.) Also Sohrab.

Suidas (sū'i-das). [Gr. Σουΐδας.] Lived probably in the latter half of the 10th century A. D. A Byzantine lexicographer, author of a famous encyclopedic Greek lexicon. "The works of Suidas, like those of Photius, contain a vast store of various learning, singularly useful on points of criticism and literary history. The lexicon of this writer, besides the definition of words, contains accounts of ancient authors of all classes, and many quotations from works that have since perished." Taylor.

The author of the great lexicon which bears the name of Suidas is known to us only from the title-page of this compilation, and from occasional citations in the commentary of Eustathius. That he was a Byzantine monk is merely a conjecture started by Jeannes Rosinus and adopted by subsequent scholars. Even the age in which he flourished is quite uncertain; for it cannot be ascertained whether the references to certain personages of a comparatively modern date belong to the original fabric of the lexicon, or were subsequent additions.

Sulla (sul'ä). Lucius Cornelius, surnamed Felix. Born about 138 B. C.: died 78 B. C. A celebrated Roman general and dictator. As quæstor in the army of Marius he served in the war against Jugurtha (107–106), and captured Jugurtha, fought against the Cimbri and Teutones (102–101), was praetor in Cilicia (reëstablished the authority of the general Pompey in Cilicia and restored Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia), took part in the second War against Mithridates, and negotiated the famous treaty of Dardanus in 85. He was made consul in 88, and was appointed by the senate to conduct the war against Mithridates and restore Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia, which had been overrun by Mithridates and Tigranes. He landed in Italy in 83, defeated the Marian party at Sacriportus in 82, and the Samnites at the Colline gate near Rome. He pursued a sweeping proscription (see proscription, extract below); was appointed dictator for an indefinite term in 82; reorganized the senate and the popular assemblies; established military colonies in Italy; and resigned the dictatorship in 79.

One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, which list was exhibited in the forum to public view, and read aloud by a herald. The effect was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws, who might be killed by any one with impunity, and who forfeited their property, which was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction. Their children and grandchildren had their votes in the comitia and were excluded from all public offices. Rewards were also proposed for those who produced the head of the proscribed: received two talents for a head, and whoever delivered another person was promised a fixed sum. Informers were not only at first, but the subject of public encouragement. The lists of the proscribed were constantly appended. No one was safe for his public conduct in the past, or for his wealth, or for the personal enmity of persons whose property was coveted by his adherents. At length, when one or even a pound of plate was to equal a man who had been of the defeated party his deathwarrant; but although the confiscated property belonged to the state, and had been sold by public auction, the friends and dependents of the proscribed (if of a nominal equality) could purchase it at a low price. On fortunes Sulla did not require the purchase-money to be paid at all, and in many cases he gave the whole property to his favorites: a method of rewarding them which

He wrote "Musci Alleghanienses" (1845), "Musci and Hepaticæ of the United States East of the Mississippi River" (1856). Lesquereux (1860) etc.

Sully (sul'i; French pron. sü-lē'). Duc de (Maximilien de Béthune, Baron de Rosny). Born at Rosny, France, Dec. 13, 1560: died at the castle of Villebon, France, Dec. 22, 1641. A French Protestant statesman. He became the companion and minister of Henry of Navarre, served with distinction in the latter's campaigns, especially at Ivry, and became celebrated as one of the advisers under Henry IV. (1595–1610). He was made a duke and peer, was appointed governor of Poitou, in 1604, and was made a marshal by Louis XIII. in 1634. He was influential in nearly all departments of the government during the reign of Henry IV. He published "Memoirs des sages et royales œconomies d'état, domestiques, politiques, et militaires, de Henri le Grand" (2 vols. 1638). Twenty other volumes were published by Jean de Laboureur in 1662.

The extraordinary form of Sully's Memoirs is well known. They are neither a narrative of by himself, nor of him as by a historian of the actual kind. They are directly addressed to the history the honest and adequate rendering of his own actions. "You do, I say, he addresses" his Majesty then upon sent you there . . . when you were two leagues from your lodging poste-toi, sur ce courtaut-rouncin, cote it by-chemins, that is, as one would say, riding briskly in the highest degree, uncurtailed and heavy, and after the first quarter of an hour read it more as the book very hard to read. It contains however a very large number of short memoirs of documents of all kinds, in which the elaborate pages of "vous" are not abandoned. It shows Sully as he was, a loyal and skilful statesman; but it does not give a pleasant idea of his character.

Scribner's, French Lit., p. 254.

Sully, James. Born at Bridgwater, Somersetshire, 1842. An English psychologist. He was educated at the Bridgwater College, London, the University of Gottingen, and the University of London. Sumy (sö'mē). A town in the government of Kharkoff, southern Russia, situated on the Psiol 106 miles northwest of Kharkoff. It is an important trading center for the Ukraine. Population, 19,818.

Sun (sun). The central body of the solar system, around which the earth and other planets revolve, retained in their orbits by its attraction, and supplied with energy by its radiance. Its mean distance from the earth is a little less than 93 millions of miles, its horizontal parallax being 8."80. Its mean apparent diameter is 32' 4".5; its actual diameter 865,000 miles (109 times that of the earth). Its volume is therefore a little more than 1,300,000 times that of the earth. Its mass—that is, the quantity of matter in it—is 324,000 times as great as that of the earth and is about 98.0 times as great as the united masses of all of the planets. The force of gravity at the sun's surface is nearly 27 times as great as at the earth's surface. The sun's mean density is only one fourth that of the earth, or less than 1/4 times that of water. By means of the spectroscope its density is determined. It is found that the sun's equator is inclined 7¼° to the plane of the ecliptic. The sun's visible surface is called the photosphere, and is made up of minute irregularly rounded "granules," intensely brilliant, and apparently floating in a darker medium. These are usually 400 or 500 miles in diameter, and so distributed in streaks and groups as to make the surface, even with a low power telescope, look much like rough drawing-paper. In the neighborhood of the sun-spots, and to some extent upon all parts of the sun, facular (bright-streaked) areas due to an unusual crowding together and upheaval of the granules of the photosphere) are found. At the time of a total eclipse certain scarlet cloud-like objects are usually observed projecting beyond the edges of the moon. These are the prominences, called protuberances, which in 1868 were proved by the spectroscope to consist mainly of hydrogen, and have been discovered to be merely excrescences from an envelop of incandescent gases which overlies the photosphere like a sheet of scarlet flame, and is known as the chromosphere. The thickness of this is very irregular, but averages about 5,000 miles. The prominences are often from 50,000 to 100,000 miles in height, and occasionally exceed 200,000; they are less permanent than the sun-spots, and their changes and motions are correspondingly swift. They are not confined to limited zones of the sun's surface: those of the greatest brilliance and activity are, however, usually connected with spots, or with the locale which attend the spots. The corona—the most impressive feature of a total eclipse—is a great "glory," of irregular outline, surrounding the sun, and composed of nebulous rays and streams which protrude from the solar surface, and extend sometimes to a distance of several millions of miles, especially in the plane of the sun's equator. The lower parts are intensely bright, but the others part are faint and indefinite. Its real nature, as a true solar appendage and no mere optical or atmospheric phenomenon, has been abundantly demonstrated by both the spectroscope and the camera. The sun is believed to be, in the main, a mass of intensely heated gas and vapor, powerfully compressed by its own gravity. The central part is entirely gaseous, because its temperature, being from physical necessity higher than that of the incising photosphere, is far above the so-called "critical point" for every known substance. Condensation, no liquefaction even, can therefore occur in the solar depths. But near the outer surface radiation to space is nearly free, the temperature is lowered to a point below the "critical point" of certain substances, and under the powerful pressure due to solar gravity condensation of the vapors begins, and thus a sheet of incandescent cloud is formed, which constitutes the photosphere. The chromosphere consists of the permanent gases and the uncondensed vapors which overlie the cloud-sheet, while the coronal filaments, in great degree of mystery, as regards both the substances which compose it and the forces which produce and arrange its streamers.

Sunapee Lake (sun'a-pē lāk). A lake in New Hampshire, 27 miles west-northwest of Concord. Its outlet is through Sugar River into the Connecticut. Length, 8 miles.

Sunart (sün'ärt). Loch. An arm of the ocean on the coast of Argyllshire, western Scotland, situated north of Mull. Length, 19½ miles.

Surya (sör'ya). [In Skt., an adjective of relation from savar, the sun, sunlight, light; pronounced in the Vedic saur) which came to be used substantively.] The Sun: in the Rigveda one of the two most common designations of the Sun, the other being Savitri. Surya is called the son of Dyaus and also the son of Aditi, while in some passages he is distinguished from the Adityas. In one place (Satas. the Dawn, is said to be his wife, while in another the Dawns are said to produce him together with Savitri and Aditi. He moves in a car drawn sometimes by one, sometimes by several or by seven, fleet and ruddy horses or mares. Pushan goes as his messenger with his golden ship, which sail in the aerial ocean. Surya is the preserver of all things stationary and moving, the viewer of men, and common to them all, and he holds the good and bad deeds of mortals. He is the eye of Mitra and Varuna and sometimes of Agni. He is sometimes identified with Indra, but in many passages his position is dependent, his path being prepared by Indra, the Vasus, Soma, Bhaga, Varuna, Mitra and Varuna, Aditi and Vanina, Indra and Vishnu, or the Angirases, when the divine personality of the Sun is thrown into the background, and it becomes little more than a part of nature. On surya in the Veda, see Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 1–76–164.) There is also a feminine personality Surya (Sūryā), who is sometimes merely the sun personified as feminine, sometimes the wife of Soma, sometimes the daughter of Surya or Savitri and given in marriage to Soma, the Moon. The Sūryā or Sūryāsukta, "surya hymn" (Rigveda N. 85), describing this wedding plays an important part in the wedding ceremony.

Suryasiddhanta (sör-ya-sid-dhän'ta). ['Siddhanta of the Sun." See Siddhanta.] A celebrated astronomical work in Sanskrit, said to be a direct revelation from the Sun, and thought by some to be the same as the Surnasiddhanta or one of the five earlier works on which was founded the Panchasiddhantika of Varahamihira, who lived about the beginning of the 6th century A. D. The Suryasiddhanta has been edited by Fitzedward Hall and Bapu Deva Shastrin in the "Bibliotheca Indica," and translated by the latter for the same series. The "Journal of the American Oriental Society" (Vol. VI) also contains a translation nominally by Ebenezer Burgess, but practically by W. D. Whitney, accompanied by a very thorough commentary by Whitney, one of the most valuable contributions of that scholar to Oriental research.

Sus (sūs). A mountainous district in Morocco, lying south and southwest of the city of Morocco.

Susa (sö'sä). In ancient geography, the capital of Susiana or Elam, situated between the rivers Kerkha and Diz'il, about lat. 32° N., long. 48° 25' E.: the modern Sūs or Shush, and the scriptural Shushan. It was a royal residence and flourishing city throughout the period of the Achæmenid kings. The site at present (1891) is a group of large and high mounds, forming together a diamond-shaped mass about 2½ miles in extent. Excavations were made in 1851 by Loftus in one of the mounds, in which he found the bricks of the palace of Artaxerxes Mnemon, the cliff-frieze being a fine colonnade of arched front. Three avenues of Doric by between Ist and 2nd, and here beneath these ruins those of the palace of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and showed that the upper strata of the mound are formed by superposed layers of ruins, still but imperfectly explored.

Length, about 1,000 miles; navigable to near Ludhiana.

Sutra (sö'tra). In Sanskrit, originally a 'thread, cord,' and then a brief rule, or book of such rules, so named because each rule was a short 'line,' or because the collection was a 'string' of rules. These rules appear to have been at first mere aids to the memory of teachers, whence they came to be the basis of teaching not only in religious ritual but also in philosophy and grammar. Thus there are the Shrautasutras, and among them especially the Kalpasutras, founded on Shruti (see Smriti and Shruti) and treating especially of ritual, and the Grihyasutras and Samayacharikasutras or Dharmasutras, which are 'rules for domestic ceremonies' and 'rules for conventional customs,' the last two being called collectively Smartasutras, as based on Smriti. Out of the last grew the Dharmashastras or 'law-books.' Each system of philosophy has its text-book written in Sutras. Examples in grammar and related subjects are the celebrated Sutras of Panini, the Unadisutras on certain affixes, and the Pratishakyas on Vedic accent and phonetics.

Swan, Knight of the. A local religious myth of Brabantine origin. The principal part of the story is that a mysterious knight who appears in a small boat drawn by a swan, and performs helpful deeds, saves the lady of the story, and marries her, but when cautioned with her only on condition that she does not ask his name; this condition, with the Knights of the Grail, who were obliged to disappear if questioned. The condition having been broken, the swan and boat reappear and he is carried off by the swan. This story is very ancient, and is told of Helias, Lohengrin (in the Round Table cycle), Salvius, Gerhard the Swan, and others, and the lady is Elsa of Brabant, Beatrix of Cleves, etc. There are numerous romances in French, German, and English on this subject. The story of the seven swan-maidens is another myth pieced on to the genuine story of the Knight of the Swan.

It was in commemoration of the beautiful myth of the Swan Knight that Frederick II. of Brandenburg instituted the Order of the Swan, in 1440. . . . The badge of the Cleves order of knighthood was also a silver swan suspended from a gold chain. Charles, Duke of Cleves, attempted to revive the order of the Swan. When Cleves fell to Prussia, the Count de Bar endeavored to persuade Frederick the Great to resuscitate the order, but in vain. With Anne of Cleves, the white swan passed to our tavern sign-boards.

The Sw. name for Sweden is Sverige. Dan. Sverrig, Icel. Svíaríki, kingdom of the Svear or Swedes.] A kingdom of Europe, in the eastern part of the Scandinavian peninsula. Capital, Stockholm. It is bounded by Norway on the west and north, Finland, the Gulf of Bothnia, and the Baltic Sea on the east, the Baltic on the south, and the Sound, Cattegat, and Skager Rack on the west, and extends from lat. 55° 20′ to 69° 3′ N., and in long. 11° 06′ to 24° E. There are three main divisions—Gothland in the south, Svealand in the centre, and Norrland in the north. The surface is generally hilly, among the ranges of the Kolen runs along the northwestern boundary between Sweden and Norway. The kingdom contains many lakes—Wenern, Wetter, Mälar, etc.) and rivers, and possesses many neighboring islands, including Gotland and Oland. The leading occupation is agriculture. There is considerable mineral wealth, particularly iron. Timber, iron, hardware and wooden wares, etc., are exported. The country is subdivided into 25 lens or provinces. The government is hereditary constitutional monarchy, the executive authority being vested in the king and the Riksdag of two houses (both elected). Sweden and Norway have been united under the same sovereign since 1814, and are governed by each other in war, but are otherwise practically independent. The inhabitants are mostly Swedes: there are a few Finns and Lapps in the north. The prevailing religion is Protestant (Lutheran). Sweden was inhabited in early times by various tribes, the chief of them being the Goths in the south and the Swedes in the north. Christianity was finally established about the end of the 11th century. The union of the Goths and Swedes took place in the 13th century. The union of the three kingdoms Denmark, Sweden, and Norway was established by Margaret of Kalmar in 1397. A rebellion against the Danes was led by Gustavus Vasa, who was elected king in 1523. The Reformation was introduced by him. Sweden became one of the leading European powers in the 17th century. It took a leading part in the Thirty Years' War under Gustavus Adolphus and his successor, obtained a large part of Pomerania, Bremen-Verden, etc., in 1648, and carried on wars with Denmark and Poland; received Livonia, Esthonia, Scania, etc., in 1660; carried on the Northern War, under Charles XII., against Denmark, Russia, and Poland, 1700–21, and ceded a large part of its possessions in northern Germany in 1719–1720; ceded Livonia, Esthonia, etc., to Russia in 1721; and ceded Finland to Russia in 1809. Norway was united with it in 1814. Its remaining possessions in Germany were ceded to Prussia in 1815. Area, 170,979 square miles. Population (1891), 4,802,751.

Swedenborg (swē'dn-bôrg; Sw. pron. svä'den-borg) (originally Svedberg or Swedberg), Emanuel. Born at Stockholm, Jan. 29, 1688: died at London, March 29, 1772. A celebrated Swedish philosopher and theosophist, founder of the New Church. He was educated at Upsala; traveled in Europe 1710–14; was appointed assessor of the Swedish college of mines in 1716; distinguished himself at the siege of Frederikshall in 1718 by the invention of machines for the transport of boats overland from Stromstadt to Idefjord; and was subsequently elevated to the nobility. About 1743 he commenced to have "visions," and in 1747 resigned his office in order to devote himself wholly to the expounding of Scripture as the immediate mouthpiece of God. His chief theological work, entitled in full "Arcana cœlestia" (1749–56). Among his other works are "Opera philosophice et mineralogica" (1734), "Clavis regni animalis" (1740–41), and "Regnum animale" (1744). See Swedenborgians.

Swedenborgians (swē-dn-bôr'ji-anz). The believers in the theology and religious doctrines of Swedenborg; the New-Churchmen. Swedenborg held Rev. xxi. 2, "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven," to be a prediction of the establishment of a new dispensation, the initiation of which took place by the execution of the last judgment in the spiritual world in the year 1757, whereby man was restored to moral freedom by the restriction of evil infestations, the power of which had threatened its utter extinction. In proof of this belief his followers point to the unparalleled spiritual and material progress of mankind. They were first organized in London (where Swedenborg long resided) in 1778 under the name of the "Society of the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem," usually abbreviated to New Church. Professed Swedenborgians, though widely scattered, have never been numerous; but Swedenborg himself appears not to have contemplated the establishment of a separate church, tending to the permeation of his doctrines through the existing churches. Swedenborgians believe that this process is going on, and that thus the new dispensation is making its way independently of their own organization or efforts, and even without the conscious knowledge of most of those affected by it. Swedenborg considered himself the divinely appointed key, but not expounder of this dispensation, being prepared for the office by open intercourse during many years with spirits and angels (all originally human beings) of both God-famed and -benighted regions, and by the spiritual sense of the Divine Word (which the world did not perceive) dawning in a state of correspondence approximately to the both spiritual and celestial degrees. This key is to be found in the correspondence of all material things with the spiritual principles, good or evil, of which they are the outgrowth and manifestation. This doctrine of correspondences is the fundamental of his system, which he elaborated with uniform consistency in many volumes all published in Latin. In this language also he composed the plenary inspiration of the Word which includes only the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings the Prophets and Psalms, the four Gospels and the Apocalypse; the other books of the Bible are available for instruction, but lack this divine character.

Swedish (swē'dish). The language of the Swedes; a Scandinavian dialect akin to Danish and Norwegian-Icelandic, old Swedish preserved in many inscriptions from the end of the viking age in the 11th century, and in literature from late in the 13th century. Modern Swedish dates from the Reformation.

Sweyn, or Swein (swān), or Swegen (swā'gen), or Svend (svend), 1014. King of Denmark; son of Harold Bluetooth and father of Canute. He invaded England in 994 and 1003, and conquered England in 1013.

Sweyn, or Swein. Died about 1051. An English earl, eldest son of Godwine. He was outlawed and exiled in 1046; was restored; and was finally exiled on account of his crimes.

Sweyn. Died 1076. King of Denmark 1047–1076, son of Canute. He invaded England in 1068.

Swift (swift), Jonathan. Born at Dublin, Nov. 30, 1667; died there, Oct. 19, 1745. A celebrated English satirist and many of letters: usually spoken of as Dean Swift. His grandfather, Thomas Swift, was vicar of Goodrich in Herefordshire, was a follower of Charles I. Swift matriculated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1682, leaving with only a degree speciali gratia in 1686. In 1688, owing to the Revolution, he went to England and in 1689 became amanuensis or secretary to Sir William Temple (who was in some way related to Swift's mother) at Moor Park, near Farnham. He disliked this subordinate position, and returned to Dublin in about a year. In 1692 he received the degree of B. A. at Oxford, took orders in 1695, and in 1696 published "The Battle of the Books." Getting, Ireland. In 1696, tired of obscurity, he returned to Sir William Temple, and remained with him till his death in Jan., 1699. During these years of quiet he not only read much, but was in such intimate relations with the court as to obtain an insight into politics which later was of use to him. In 1698 he wrote "A Tale of a Tub," and in 1697 the "Battle," or the latter work published in 1704): he also published an edition of Temple's works 1700–1709. He was made rector of Agher, in Meath, and vicar of Laracor in 1700, and held other small livings. In 1706 he had offered marriage to Mrs. Waring ("Varina"), who refused him on account of his ill health and his poverty. When he received the living of Laracor, however, in 1700, she wished the marriage to take place. He broke off the match by saying that if she would submit to be educated so that she would entertain him, soothe his humors, accept his likes and dislikes, etc., he would overlook deficiencies in look and income. He published the Whig tract "A Discourse on the Dissensions in Athens and Rome" in 1701. At Laracor he was joined by Mrs. Rebecca Dingley and by Esther Johnson (born in 1681), a daughter of Sir William Temple, who presided over his house-keeping. Between the years 1701 and 1709 he issued the pamphlets "The Sentiments of a Church of England Man" and "On the Reasonableness of a Test"; these were followed by the ironical "Argument Against Abolishing Christianity" and by his best poem, "Baucis and Philemon." He was in London for a longer or shorter period nearly every year from 1702 to 1716. At this time he abandoned the Whigs and went over to the Tories: a full account of this is given in the "Journal to Stella," written 1710–13, and not intended for the public. In Nov., 1710, he began to write for "The Examiner," Tory political, and formed the "Society of Brothers." In July, 1711, he left the "Examiner," but continued to write Tory pamphlets ("The Conduct of the Allies" and "Remarks on the Barrier Treaty"). He was appointed by Queen Anne dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, in 1713. He was intimately associated with Oxford and Bolingbroke, and was a friend of Steele, Addison, Prior, Arbuthnot, Congreve, Attebury, Parnell, and Gay. Some of his best work belongs to this period. The last four years of Queen Anne—After the fall of the Tory ministry in 1714 Swift, while living in London, Esther Vanhomrigh, the "Vanessa" of his poem "Cadenus and Vanessa," had formed an attachment for him. In 1714 her mother died, and she followed Swift to Ireland. It is probable that in 1716 he was privately married to "Stella," and in 1717 "Vanessa" retired to Marley Abbey at Celbridge, where Swift visited her. In 1723 "Vanessa" wrote to "Stella" demanding an explanation of her relation to Swift. "Stella" replied that she was his wife, and sent "Vanessa's" letter to Swift, who returned it with characteristic fits of passion, went to "Vanessa," threw her letter on a table without a word, and rode away. This was her death-blow: she lived only a few weeks longer. Swift devoted himself earnestly to the cause of Irish trade and Irish politics, and in 1720 published his "Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures," urging the boycotting of English goods by the Irish. A patent having been granted to William Wood, who shared a 40 per cent. profit with the Duchess of Kendal, the king's mistress, in 1724 Swift published his "Drapier's Letters," which raised this abuse in letters signed "M. B. Drapier," which raised his popularity to a height that it always retained. Returning to England, he was recalled on account of Stella's illness. In 1726 he visited Stella, and in 1726 he published "Gulliver's Travels," and in 1729 his "Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People in Ireland from being a Burden to their Parents"—his most famous satire, being that they should be fattened and eaten. In his later years his brain became diseased, and he was alternately in a state of furious and apathetic temper for a year or two: his intellect was almost wholly eclipsed, a fact of which he was conscious at intervals. He was put under restraint in 1741, and Bucrus Hill 1745. He was buried in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. With Arbuthnot and Pope he carried out the scheme of the "Scribleras Club" (which see). Among his works not mentioned above are "Pindarics" (1701), "Meditation upon a Broomstick" (1703), "Argument to prove the Inconvenience of Atheism" (1710), "Proposal for Correcting, Improving and Ascertaining the English Tongue" (1712), "Free Thoughts on the State of Public Affairs" (1714), "History of the Last Four Years of Queen Anne" (not published till 1757–58; a number of volumes of miscellanies with Arbuthnot, Pope, Gay, Sheridan, and others), "The Legion Club" (1735; a satire against the Irish House of Commons), "Directions to Servants," and "Polite Conversation" (1738). A number of volumes of sermons, tracts, essays, and letters have also been published.

Swift, Lewis. Born at Clarkson, N. Y., Feb. 29, 1820. A distinguished American astronomer, director of the Warner Observatory at Rochester, New York, from 1882. He is especially noted as a discoverer of comets. See also Dulie.

Swilly (swil'i), Lough. An inlet of the Atlantic in Ulster, Ireland, northwest of Londonderry. Length, 27 miles.

Swinburne (swin'bėrn), Algernon Charles. Born at London, April 5, 1837. An English poet, son of Admiral Swinburne and Lady Henrietta Ashburnham, daughter of the third Earl of Ashburnham. He was educated in France, and at Eton and Oxford (Balliol College), entering the university in 1857 and leaving without a degree. He is especially remarkable for his facile metrical invention. He has published "The Queen Mother" and "Rosamond" (1860), "Atalanta in Calydon" (1864), "Chastelard: a Tragedy" (1865), "Poems and Ballads" (1866; these works severely censured that the edition was withdrawn, but it was reprinted the same year as "Laus Veneris, and other Poems and Ballads," and Swinburne replied to the criticism (also in 1866) with "Notes on Poems and Reviews"), "William Blake: a Critical Essay" (1867), "An Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic" (1870), "Songs Before Sunrise" (1871), "Under the Microscope" (1872), a second series of "Poems and Ballads" (1878), "A Study of Shakspere" (1879), "The Modern Heptalogia, or the Seven Against Sense" (1880), "Songs of the Springtides" (1880), "Studies in Song" (1880), "Mary Stuart: a Tragedy" (1881), "Tristram of Lyonesse, etc." (1882), "A Century of Roundels" (1883), "A Midsummer Holiday, and other Poems" (1884), "Marino Faliero: a Tragedy" (1885), "Prose Miscellanies" (1886), "A Study of Victor Hugo" (1886), "A Study of Ben Jonson" "Locrine: a Tragedy" (1887), "The Armada" (1888), and "Poems and Ballads" (1889).

Swinemünde (svē'ne-mün-de). A seaport in the province of Pomerania, Prussia, situated on the island Usedom, at the mouth of the Swine, in lat. 53° 55′ N., long. 14° 17′ E. It forms the outer port of Stettin. It is a watering-place, and has an excellent harbor and important commerce. Population (1890), 8,508.

Swing (swing), Captain. A fictitious name signed to various threatening letters in England, about 1830, especially to letters addressed to the users of threshing-machines, which were obnoxious to the old-fashioned threshers.

Swing (swing), David. Born at Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 25, 1830. An American Presbyterian clergyman, tried for heresy in Chicago in 1874, and acquitted. He was afterward pastor of an independent church.

Swiss Guards, The. A corps of Swiss mercenary troops in the French service, formed in 1616 and finally disbanded in 1830. They are celebrated for their valor in the defense of the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792, commemorated in the "Lion of Lucerne" at Lucerne.

Swithin (swith'in), or Swithun (swith'un), Saint. Born near Winchester, probably about 800: died about 862. A bishop of Winchester. It was fabled that he performed many miraculous cures after his death, and he was translated with great ceremonial July 15, 971. He resembled Cuthbert, but received his title of saint on his translation. He has, for no known reason, become associated in the popular mind with drunkenness. He is named in folklore, a common adage being that if it rains on St. Swithin's day (July 15), it will rain for forty days after.

Switzerland (swit'zėr-land). ['Landof the Switzers"; G. Die Schweiz, F. Suisse, It. Svizzera, Sp. Suiza.] A country of Europe, bounded by France on the west and northwest, Baden and Prussia on the north, the Lake of Constance on the northeast, Vorarlberg and Tyrol on the east, and Italy and France on the south: Latin Helvetia. Capital, Bern. The main range of the Alps in the south (partly on the Italian border) is separated from a secondary range of the Alps (Bernese Oberland, Uri, Santis, etc.) by the valleys of the Rhone and Rhine: the Jura is in the west and north. (See Alps.) The highest mountain is Monte Rosa (over 15,000 feet). The lakes are the Lakes of Geneva, Constance, Lucerne, Zurich, and Neuchâtel. The leading industries are cotton, woolen, and silk manufactures, straw-plaiting, manufactures of embroidery, clocks and watches, wooden wares, chemicals, machinery, musical boxes, etc., and dairy-farming. The country contains many pleasure- and health-resorts, and is famous as a summer resort of tourists. It contains 22 cantons in a confederation, the several cantons being very largely independent in internal matters. The government of the confederation is vested in a federal assembly of two houses: the State Council ("Standerath" or "Conseil des États") of 44 members (2 for each canton), and the National Council ("Nationalrath" or "Conseil National"), with 147 representatives. The Federal Assembly in joint session elects the executive body, the Federal Council ("Bundesrath" or "Conseil Fédéral"), of 7 members, and also the president of the Federal Council, who is elected for one year as president of the Swiss Confederation. "Whenever a petition demanding the revision or annulment of a measure passed by the Legislature is presented by 30,000 citizens, or the alteration is demanded by eight cantons, the law in question must be submitted to the direct vote of the nation. This principle, called the referendum, is frequently acted on." (The Statesman's Year-Book, 1894, p. 995.) Cantonal government is exercised by a great council or directly by the citizens in popular assembly ("Landesgemeinde"). About three fifths of the inhabitants are Protestants and about two fifths Roman Catholics. About 2,400,000 speak German, 600,000 French, 160,000 Italian, and 38,000 Rumonsch. The ancient inhabitants were Helvetii and other tribes. The land became part of the Roman Empire and largely of the province of Gaul, and was settled by Burgundians, Alamanni, etc. The league between Uri, Schwyz, and Nidwald (in Unterwalden) against Hapsburg oppression was formed 1291. The legend of Tell and the founding of the confederation at Ruth are assigned to the beginning of the 14th century. The Swiss defeated the Austrians at Morgarten in 1315, and renewed the league the same year. Lucerne joined the confederation in 1332, Zurich in 1351, Glarus in 1352, Zug in 1352, and Bern in 1353. The Austrians were defeated at Sempach in 1386, and various conquests were made in the 14th century. Besides its own members, the confederation recognized "associates" and "protected districts." The Swiss were freed from Austrian claims in 1394 and 1474. They defeated Charles the Bold of Burgundy at Granson and Murten in 1476. The "compact of Stanz" was formed in 1481. Fribourg and Solothurn were admitted in 1481. Switzerland became practically independent of the Empire in 1499. Basel and Schaffhausen were admitted in 1501, and Appenzell in 1513. The Swiss were defeated at Marignano by Francis I. of France in 1515, and concluded peace with France in 1516. The Reformation was introduced into various parts by Zwingli, Farel, Calvin, etc. The Golden League between Catholic members was formed in 1586. Switzerland became formally independent of the Empire in 1648. The Helvetic Republic was proclaimed in 1798, under the influence of France. A revolt of the Forest Cantons was suppressed by the French in 1798, and the country was the scene of much fighting in the wars of the Coalition and Consulate. The confederation was restored in 1803, and the cantons of St. Gall, Grisons, Aargau, Thurgau, Ticino, and Vaud were added. A new constitution was adopted, neutrality was guaranteed, and the cantons of Geneva, Valais, and Neuchâtel were added in 1815. The wars of the "Sonderbund" occurred in 1847. Government was made more centralized by the constitution of 1848, somewhat revised from Prussian claims in 1857. The constitution was revised in 1874. Area, 15,976 square miles. Population (1888), 2,917,754.

Such is the Switzerland of our own time, but such was not the Switzerland with which Charles the Bold had to deal. In those days the name of Switzerland, as a distinct nation or people, was hardly known. The names Switzenses, Switzois, Suisses, were indeed beginning to spread themselves from a single canton to the whole Confederation; but the formal style of that Confederation was still that of "the Great League of Upper Germany," or perhaps rather of "Upper Swabia." That League was much smaller than it is now, and it was purely German. It comprised eight townships-districts-and-states, united, like many other groups of German cities, by a lax Federal tie, which tie, while other similar unions have died away, has gradually developed into a perfect Federal government, and has extended itself over a large non-German territory. The League then consisted of eight cantons only—Zurich, Bern, Luzern, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Glarus. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 85.

Swiveller (swiv'el-ėr), Dick. A happy-go-lucky, devil-may-care fellow in Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop."

> Altogether, and because of rather than in spite of his weaknesses, Dick is a captivating person. His gaiety and good humour survive such accumulations of "staggerers," he makes such discoveries of "the rosy" in the very antithesis of drinks, and becomes himself by his solacements of verse such a "perpetual grand Apollo," that his failings are all but forgotten, and hearts resolutely shut against victims of destiny in general open themselves freely to Dick Swiveller. Forster, Life of Dickens, ii. 7.

Syamantaka (sya-man'ta-ka). In Hindu mythology, a celebrated jewel of which the story is told in the Vishnupurana. It yielded daily eight loads of gold, and expelled all fear of portents, wild beasts, fire, robbers, and famine; but, though an inexhaustible resource to a virtuous, it was deadly to a wicked, wearer. It was given by Surya, the Sun, to Satrajit, Surya recompensing Satrajit for praises rendered him by allowing himself to be seen in his proper form and by the bestowal of the gem. Afraid that Krishna would take it from him, Satrajit gave the jewel to his own brother, Prasena, but Prasena was killed by a lion. Jambavat, king of the bears, killed the lion and carried off the gem; but Krishna took it from him and restored it to Satrajit, who in thankfulness gave him his daughter Satyabhama in marriage. One of the many suitors of Satyabhama had been Shatadhanan, who now killed Satrajit in his sleep and carried off the gem. Pursued by Krishna and Balarama, Shatadhanan gave it to Akrura and continued his flight, but was overtaken and killed by Krishna. As Krishna did not bring back the jewel, Balarama upbraided him with secreting it, and parted from him. Akrura, after fifty-five days' flight, was at last overclaimed by Krishna. Balarama and Satyabhama and decided that Akrura should keep it, whence he moved about like the sun wearing a garland of light.

Sybaris (sib'a-ris). [Gr. Σύβαρις.] In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, southern Italy, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum in lat. 39° 41′ N., long. 16° 28′ E. It was founded by Achæan colonists in 720 B. C. It was celebrated for its wealth, and its inhabitants were proverbial for the luxury and effeminacy (the epithet Sybarite). It was destroyed by the inhabitants of Crotona in 510 B. C.

> Sybaris was one of the most important towns of Magna Græcia. According to Strabo it was founded by the Achæans (B. vi. p. 263, probably about B. C. 720, Müller's Dor. ed. 1, p. 102, note 5, p. 174). The colonization was most likely connected with the political aspect of the Peloponnese by the Heraclidæ. Its site is marked by the junction of the Crathis (Coscile) with the Sybaris (Crati). Sybaris stretched 4 miles N.W. and S.E., and was about 2 miles in breadth across; it had twenty-five subject cities and ruled over four neighbouring tribes. In the days of its greatest prosperity it could have brought into the field 300,000 men (Strab. l. s. c.). Its excessive luxury is proverbial. It was taken in B. C. 510 after a siege of 70 days by Hippocrates, who turned the river Sybaris on the town, and in this way destroyed it. Axes and chargers upon the ruins of the first, but it never flourished, and was finally merged in the Athenian colony of Thurii (B. C. 443), which was built on a spot in the neighbourhood. Herodotus was one of the colonists (Suidas).

Sylvius (sil'vi-us) (Jacques Dubois). Born at Amiens, France, 1478; died at Paris, 1555. A French anatomist, lecturer on anatomy at Paris. He made various anatomical discoveries, and invented injection. From him the Sylvian aqueduct, the Sylvian artery, and the Sylvian tissure (of the brain) were named.

Syme. See Symi.

Syme (sīm), James. Born at Edinburgh, Nov. 7, 1799; died June 26, 1870. A noted Scottish surgeon. Among his works are "Excision of Diseased Joints" (1831), "Principles of Surgery" (1832), etc.

Symeon, Henry. See the extract.

> The inceptor [at Oxford] was required to swear that he would never consent "to the reconciliation of Henry Symeon, or reassume the degrees" Bachelor of that family. The exact nature of Henry Symeon's offence is not stated, but for century after century the implacable university held him up to the obloquy of successive bachelors who were about to receive their degrees. Long ago this has been taken in a sense precisely contrary to that which it was intended until the year of grace 1867. Wood—Oxford University Statutes, A. D. 1636—Bryan Twyne states that Symeon was a Bachelor of Arts, and who feigned himself a Bachelor in order to obtain admission to a foreign university in which degree a modern arts was not allowed. (Antiquitates Oxon., lib. ii. p. 250.) He does not, however, cite any authority for this plausible explanation.]

Symeon of Durham. See Simeon of Durham.

Symi (sē'mē). A small island off the southwest coast of Asia Minor, 15 miles south of Rhodes: the ancient Syme. It belongs to Turkey.

Symi, Gulf of. An arm of the sea on the coast of Asia Minor, near the island of Symi.

Symmachus (sim'a-kus). Lived at the end of the 2d century A. D. The author of a Greek version of the Old Testament, known as the Symmachus.

Symmachus. Pope 498–514. The "Palmary Synod" was held in his reign, 501.

Symmachus, Quintus Aurelius. Lived about 400 A. D. A Roman pagan orator, writer, and politician. He was prefect of Rome and consul 391. He wrote epistles and orations, fragments of which are extant.

Symonds (sim'ondz), John Addington. Born at Bristol, Oct. 5, 1840; died at Rome, April 19, 1893. An English man of letters. He graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, was made a deacon in 1864. He published "An Introduction to the study of Dante" (1872). "Studies of the Greek Poets" (1873–76; 2d ed. 1879). "Sketches in Italy and Greece" (1874). His best known work, "The Renaissance in Italy," consists of five parts: "The Age of the Despots" (1875), "The Revival of Learning" (1877), "The Fine Arts" (1877), "Italian Literature" (1881), and "The Catholic Reaction" (1886). He also wrote a "Life of Shelley" (1878), "Sketches and Studies in Italy" (1879), "Italian Byways" (1883), "Shakspere's Predecessors in the English Drama" (1884), "Wine, Women, and Song, etc." (1884, an essay on the Latin songs of the 12th-century students), "Life of Sir Philip Sidney" (1886), "Life of Ben Jonson" (1886), "Life of Michelangelo" (1892), and several volumes of verse. He translated the sonnets of Michelangelo and Campanella (1878), and the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini (1887).

Symplegades (sim-pleg'a-dēz). In the legend of the Argonauts, two movable rocky islets at the entrance of the Bosporus into the Black Sea.

Symposium (sim-pō'si-um). The. [Also sometimes Sumposion; from L. symposium, from Gr. συμπόσιον, a drinking-party, drinking after a dinner, from συμπίνειν, drink with or together, from σύν, together, and πίνειν, drink.] 1. A celebrated work by Plato, an account given by Aristodemus of a banquet at the house of the tragic poet Agathon after one of his victories, at which, together with other less famous persons, Socrates, the physician Eryximachus, Aristophanes, and by and by Alcibiades, discourse on nature and praise of Eros (love).—2. A work by Xenophon, describing the character of Socrates.

Syn. See Sod.

Syndesmos (sin-dez'mos). [Gr. σύνδεσμος, a knot.] The fourth-magnitude double star a Piscium, situated at the bend or knot in the ribbon by which the two fishes are represented as joined.

Syndics of the Arquebusiers. A painting by Van der Helst (1657), in the Rijks Museum, Amsterdam, Holland. The five syndics, richly dressed, are seated about a table examining the plate of the gild. Behind is a maid bringing in a large drinking-horn, and to the right in the distance are seen soldiers with halberds.

Syndics of the Gild of the Clothmakers, or De Staalmeesters. A masterpiece by Rembrandt (1661), in the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam, Holland. The five syndics, robed in black, are assembled about a table, attended by a servant. It is a striking example of the powerful effects attained by the master with the simplest means.

Synesius (si-nē'shi-us). Born at Cyrene, 378; died about 430 A. D. A Neoplatonist philosopher and writer. He was at Constantinople 397–400, and was bishop of Ptolemais, in the Pentapolis of Libya, about 410–414. His works include letters, hymns, "Encomium Calvitii," "De Providentia," the oration "De Regno," etc.

Synesius, who was born at Cyrene in A. D. 378, must be classed rather with the school of Justin, Clement, and Origen than with the Christian sophists whom we have been considering in the last few sections. Perhaps he was the only trained Christian in the fourth or fifth century who ventured to maintain the parallel importance of heathen and Christian literature. He was born a pagan, and was not converted to Christianity till he was about thirty years old. He had been a hearer and sincere admirer of Hypatia, and even after he became a Christian and bishop of Ptolemais, towards the end of A. D. 409, he was far from embracing all the tenets of orthodoxy. He did not hesitate to confess in the most candid manner that his doctrines were rather those of Origen than those of Theophilus; and though he declared that his thoughts should never rise in open revolt against his tongue, he conceived himself at liberty to maintain an esoteric faith in accordance with his philosophical convictions, as well as the popular views of Christianity which he preached to his less instructed hearers. He lived to about A. D. 430.

Synnada (sin'a-dā). [Gr. Σύνναδα.] In ancient geography, a town of Phrygia, Asia Minor, identified with the modern Eski-Karahissar. It is noted for its marble-quarries.

Synod (sin'od). Holy Governing, of all the Russias. A synod which is the highest ecclesiastical authority in the Russian Church. It consists of several metropolitans and other prelates and officials, the chief procurator of the synod representing the czar. It was instituted by Peter the Great, in 1721, to supply the place of the Patriarch of Moscow. The last patriarch had died about 1700, and Peter would not allow the appointment of a successor, thinking the power of the patriarchal office too great. The orthodox national church of the kingdom of Greece is also governed by a synod of archbishops and bishops, independent of any patriarch.

Syphax (sī'faks). [Gr. Σύφαξ.] Died about 201 B. C. A king of the Massæsylians in western Numidia. He vacillated between the Roman and Carthaginian alliances; was often at war with Masinissa; and was finally allied with Carthage, and married Sophonisba, daughter of Hasdrubal. He overran all of Numidia, but was defeated by Scipio in 203 and taken prisoner to Rome.

Syra (sē'rä). An island of the Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, belonging to Greece, intersected by lat. 37° 25′ N., long. 24° 54′ E.: the ancient Syros. Its surface is rocky. It was of minor importance until its settlement by Greek refugees at the time of the war of independence in the 19th century. The chief town is Hermupolis. Length, 11 miles. Population, about 33,000.

Syracuse (sir'a-kūs). [Gr. Συρακόσαι.] A province in the southeastern part of Sicily. Area, 1,442 square miles. Population (1891), 395,797.

Syracuse. [Gr. Συρακόσαι, L. Syracusæ, It. Siracusa.] A city, capital of the province of Syracuse, situated on the island of Ortygia on the eastern coast of Sicily, in lat. 37° 3′ N., long. 15° 18′ E. It contains a cathedral (see below) and museum, and some relics of the ancient city are near it. There is a Roman amphitheater, presumably of the time of Augustus, formed of masonry on the south side, and in other parts hewn from the rock. Portions of the ancient barrier in marble remain standing about the arena. The temple of Athene (Pallas), of the 6th century B. C., was famous for its wealth, and was plundered by Verres. In the 7th century it was converted into a church, and is now the cathedral. The temple was Doric, hexastyle, peripteral, with 14 or 15 columns on the flanks, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring 74½ by 188 feet. The columns of the flanks are embedded in the walls of the cathedral; those of the front were overthrown by an earthquake in 1693. The two columns in antis of the pronaos survive. Proportions and details are of archaic character. The temple of Diana, so called, probably in fact the temple of Apollo, is a Greek Doric structure of the 6th century B.C., with notably archaic features. It was a peripteros of 6 by 13 monolithic columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps. Sixteen columns and a part of the cella wall are standing. Syracuse was founded by Corinthian colonists about 735 B. C. on the island, and spread over the adjoining part of the mainland, forming Achradina, Epipolæ, Neapolis, etc. Gelon, ruler of Gela, became tyrant of Syracuse in 485 B. C.; and it became the chief power in Sicily. The tyrant Thrasybulus was expelled about 466, and Syracuse became a democracy and commonwealth. It was besieged by the Athenians under Nicias and Demosthenes in 414–413, the Athenians being finally defeated with the loss of Spartan allies in 413. It was under the rule of Dionysius the elder about 405–367; was frequently at war with Carthage; was ruled by Dionysius the younger and Dion, and about 345–337 by Timoleon; had Agathocles as tyrant 317–289; and was defended by Pyrrhus against Carthage about 278. Hiero II., its king, was allied with Rome in the first and second Punic wars. It was allied with the latter; was besieged by the Romans under Marcellus 212, captured, and annexed by Rome; and was destroyed by the Saracens in the 9th century. Population (1892), 28,000.

Syracuse. The capital of Onondaga County, New York, situated near Onondaga Lake in lat. 43° 3′ N., long. 76° 13′ W. It stands on the Erie and Oswego canals; is noted for its extensive salt-works (among the largest in the country); has varied manufactures and large trade; is an important railroad-center; and is the seat of the Syracuse University (Methodist). It was settled about the end of the 18th century; had its present name given it in 1824; and became a city in 1847. Population (1890), 88,143.

Syr-Daria, or Syr-Darya. See Sir-Daria.

Syria (sir'i-a). [F. Syrie, G. Syrien, L. Syria, Gr. Συρία, from Σύρος, L. Syri, the Syrians.] A country in Asiatic Turkey, extending from the Mediterranean eastward to the Euphrates and the desert of Arabia, and from Egypt northward to about lat. 36° N. Chief city, Damascus. It includes Palestine (in the southwest), Phenicia, etc.; but is sometimes regarded as distinct from Palestine. It is traversed by mountains north and south (Lebanon, Anti-Libanus, etc.). The principal rivers are the Orontes, Litany, and Jordan. The inhabitants are Bedouins, town Arabs, Druses, Maronites, Jacobites, Jews, etc. The ancient inhabitants were Hittites, Aramæans, Canaanites, Hebrews, and Phenicians. Syria became subject to Assyria about 733 B. C., and was later under Babylon, Persia, and Macedon. Part of Syria became a kingdom under Seleucus about 300 B. C., with Antioch as capital. It was conquered by Pompey about 64 B. C., and annexed to the Roman Empire; was conquered by the Saracens about 636 A. D.; and belonged to the caliphate, Seljuk Turks, etc. A Christian kingdom was established in part of it during the Crusades. It was conquered by the Turks in 1516; and was held temporarily by Mehemet Ali of Egypt about 1831–41. Massacres of Christians in 1860 led to temporary French occupation. Population, probably from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000.

Syrian (sir'i-an) Desert, The. That part of the desert which lies east of Damascus.

Syrian Gates, The. A pass between the mountains (ancient Amanus) and the northeastern angle of the Mediterranean, leading from Cilicia to Syria: the modern Pass of Beilan.

Syrinx (si'ringks). In Greek mythology, a nymph who was changed by Pan into a reed.

Syro-Phenicia (si'rō-fē-nish'ä). A Roman province which included Phenicia and the territories of Damascus and Palmyra.

Syrophenicians (si'rō-fē-nish'anz). In ancient history, either the Phenicians dwelling in Syria, or persons of mixed Syrian and Phenician descent, or the inhabitants of Syro-Phenicia.

Syros (si'ros). The ancient name of Syra.

Syrtis Major (sėr'tis mā'jor). [L., 'Greater Syrtis.'] The ancient name of the Gulf of Sidra.

Syrtis Minor (sėr'tis mī'nor). [L., 'Lesser Syrtis.'] The ancient name of the Gulf of Cabes.

Syzran (siz-rän'). A town in the government of Simbirsk, eastern Russia, situated near the Volga 80 miles south of Simbirsk. It has manufactures of leather, etc. Population, 30,580.

Szabad (Hung. so-bod'), Emeric. Born in Hungary about 1822. A Hungarian-American author and soldier. He was secretary to the Hungarian revolutionary government in 1849, and served in the American Civil War. He wrote "Hungary," "State Policy of Modern Europe," "Modern War," etc.

Szabadka. See Theresienstadt.

Szechuen, or Sechuen (sā-chō-en'). A province of western China, bounded by Kansu and Shensi on the north, Hupeh and Hunan on the east, Kweichow and Yunnan on the south, and Tibet on the west and northwest. Capital, Chingtu. Area, 166,800 square miles. Population, 67,712,897.

Szegedin (seċh-ed-ēn'). A royal free city, capital of the county of Csongrád, Hungary, situated at the junction of the Maros with the Theiss, in lat. 46° 16′ N., long. 20° 10′ E. It is the second city of Hungary. It has important trade and various manufactures. It was formerly fortified, and was held by the Turks in the 16th and 17th centuries. It was a seat of the Hungarian revolutionary government in July, 1849. It was nearly destroyed by an inundation of the Theiss in March, 1879. Population (1890), 87,310.

Szegszárd (seċh-särd'). The capital of the county of Tolna, Hungary, situated on the Sarviz, near the Danube, in lat. 46° 23′ N. It has a trade in wine. Population (1890), 14,325.

Szigeth (sē-get'), or Marmaros-Szigeth (mor'-mo-rosh-sē-get'). The capital of the county of Marmaros, Hungary, situated at the junction of the Iza and the Theiss, in lat. 47° 56′ N. Near it is a salt-mining region. Population (1890), 14,758.

Szigethvár (sē-get-vär'). A town in the county of Somogy, Hungary, situated on the Almás 25 miles south of Kaposvár: noted for its defense under Zrinyi against the Turks in 1566. Population (1890), 5,078.

Taaffe (tä'fe), Count Eduard von. Born at Prague, Feb. 24, 1833. An Austrian statesman, of Irish descent. He was governor of Salzburg 1863–67, and of Upper Austria in 1867; entered the Austrian (Cisleithan) ministry as minister of the interior in 1867; was premier from Oct., 1869, to Jan., 1870; was minister of the interior 1870–71; became governor of Tyrol in 1871; and was again premier 1879.

Tab (täb). A river in western Persia which flows into the head of the Persian Gulf near lat. 30° N.

Tabago. See Tobago.

Tabard (tab'ärd), The. An ancient London hostelry, made famous by Chaucer as the house at which his pilgrims assembled before starting for Canterbury. It was situated on the High Street of Southwark, near the Kentish Road. Stowe says in 1598 that it was then "amongst the most ancient" of the "fair inns for receipt of travellers." It received its name from its sign, which was a tabard, or sleeveless coat. It was originally the property of the Abbey of Hyde. In 1764 the sign of the tabard (see the extract) was removed as a street obstruction, and in 1866 the inn was condemned, and shortly afterward demolished and a freight depot of the Midland Railway built on the spot.

Up to a few years before its destruction it was marked by an inscription (not ancient) which said "This is the Inne where Sir Jeffrey Chaucer and twenty pilgrims lay in their journey to Canterbury anno 1383." . . . The front towards the street was comparatively modern, having perished in the fire of 1676, after which, says Aubrey, "the ignorant landlord or tenant instead of the ancient sign of the Tabard put up the Talbot or Dog."

Hare, London, I. 462.

Tabaristan (tä-bä-ris-tän'). The region in which Balfrush is situated, in the province of Mazanderan, Persia.

Tabaristan, Sea of. A medieval name of the Caspian Sea.

Tabariyeh (tä-bä-rē'ye), or Tabarîya (tä-bä-rē'yä). The modern name of Tiberias.

Tabasco (tä-bäs'kō). A maritime state of Mexico. Capital, San Juan Bautista. It is bounded by the Gulf of Mexico, the Mexican states of Vera Cruz, Chiapas and Campeche, and Guatemala. The surface is low except in the southern part, and the soil is fertile. Area, 9,844 square miles. Population (1893), 111,820.

Tabatinga (tä-bä-tēng'gä). A military post and town in the state of Amazonas, Brazil, situated on the Amazon close to the Peruvian frontier.

Tabele, or Tebele. See Matabele.

Tabirá (tä-bē-rä'). [Origin of name doubtful, possibly Piro.] The proper name of the ruined pueblo on the mesa of Jumanos in New Mexico, now called "la gran Quivira." Tabirá was a Franciscan mission in the 17th century, but was abandoned about 1670, on account of the Apaches, at the same time as the village, the inhabitants of which retreated to the south and to the Rio Grande.

Tabitha (tab'i-thä). [LL. Tabitha, Gr. Ταβιθά; an Aramaic name meaning 'a female gazel': its Gr. translation is Δορκάς.] A Christian woman at Joppa, mentioned in Acts ix. as making garments for the poor: also called Dorcas. She was miraculously restored to life by the apostle Peter.

Tablas (tä'blās). One of the Philippine Islands, southeast of Mindoro. Length, about 30 miles.

Table (tā'bl) Bay. An arm of the ocean, on the southwestern coast of Cape Colony, South Africa. On it is Cape Town.

Table Diamond, The Great. A famous royal Indian diamond, ranked by Tavernier, who saw it in Golconda in 1642, as the third in size and quality seen by him. It weighed about 242½ carats. It was then in the hands of a dealer, the king having been obliged to raise money on it. It has disappeared, and it has been suggested that the Russian Table diamond may be a part of it. The latter diamond weighs 65 carats.

Table Mountain, or Tafelberg (tä'fel-berg). A mountain immediately south of Cape Town, South Africa, remarkable for its flattened summit. Height, about 3,500 feet.

Table Mountain. A mountain in Pickens County, in the northwestern part of South Carolina. Height, about 4,000 feet.

Table of Abydos. See the extract.

To the above-named monuments must be added the Tabled Abydos. As may be gathered from its name, it came from that site, being brought away by M. Mimaut, Consul-General of France, it is now in the British Museum. Of all the innumerable Egyptian monuments there is not one that is so famous, nor that less deserves its fame. This time it is Rameses II. who adores his ancestors, and out of the fifty-eight cartouches besides that of Rameses repeated twenty-eight times—there are now but thirty left, and these are in a state more or less incomplete. Like the Hall of Ancestors, the Table of Abydos gives a list, resulting from the artist's choice, the reason of which is also unknown. Another fact that depreciates its value is that we do not possess its commencement. After the Twelfth Dynasty, however, the list passes at once without a break to the Eighteenth.

Mariette, Outlines, p. 104.

[There are two temples at Abydos dedicated to the local divinity: the one built by Seti, the other by Ramses. The Seti temple has seven halls, twice the length of the preceding edition, adds these buildings. One is the Table described above, the other was discovered comparatively lately. Although in a miserable state of preservation, this Table yet adds but little to our knowledge. It mentions some new kings, and shows the correct sequence of others, but is far from giving us an unmutilated series of all the kings of Egypt from Menes to Seti I. – Note, p. 105.]

Table Rock. A rocky mass formerly at Niagara Falls, the presence of which is said to have at one time caused a separate fall. Until a part of it fell in June, 1850, it largely overhung the water. Some of it still remains.

Tables, The. In Scottish history, an organization, consisting of members of the privy council and others, which took the lead in opposition to the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland about 1638–39. They were so called from sitting separately or conjointly at the tables in the Parliament House.

Table-talk. A name given to various collections of essays. The most notable works so entitled are those of Luther, of John Selden (published in 1689, after the death of his amanuensis, of Judith Cornwell), and of Coleridge (published by his son in 1835, and republished in 1849). Dyce published in 1856 "Recollections of the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers"; and Gower added a poetical dialogue entitled "Table Talk" to a volume of poems published in 1782.

Tablet of Sakkarah. See the extract.

The most interesting, as also the most perfect, monument of the kind is the one that was found during the French excavations at Sakkarah, and which is now in the Gizeh palace. Unlike the others, it is not of royal origin. It was discovered in the tomb of an Egyptian priest named Thuau, who lived in the days of Ramses II. According to the Egyptian belief, one of the good things reserved for the dead who were deemed worthy of eternal life was to be admitted to the society of their kings, and Thuau is represented as having been received into the august assembly of fifty-eight. Here again in the Tablet of Sakkarah, as before in that of Abydos, is raised the same question: Why these fifty-eight kings more than any others?

Mariette, Outlines, p. 106.

Tabnit (täb'nit). King of Sidon (Phenicia) in the first part of the 4th century B. C., father of Eshmunazar.

Tabor (tā'bor). [See Taborites.] A town in Bohemia, situated on the Luschnitz 48 miles south of Prague. It was founded as a stronghold by the Hussites under Ziska in 1419. It gave name to the Taborites. Population (1890), 9,160.

Tabor (tā'bor), Mount. A wooded mountain in Palestine, 6 miles east of Nazareth, on the border of the plain of Esdraelon: famous in Old Testament history. According to a tradition it was the scene of the Transfiguration; and in the monasteries it was peopled with hermits. Height, about 1,800 feet.

Taborites (tā'bor-īts). [So called from their great fortified encampment formed, in 1419, on a hill in Bohemia named by them Mount Tabor, probably with reference both to Bohemian tabor, encampment, and to Mount Tabor in Palestine.] The members of the more extreme party of the Hussites. They were fierce and successful warriors under their successive leaders Ziska and Procopius, carrying widespread devastation, till their final defeat in 1434. See Hussites.

Tabriz (tä-brēz'), or Tavris (tä-vrēs'), or Tauris (tä'ris), or Tebris (te-brēs'). The capital of the province of Azerbaijan, Persia, situated on a tributary of Lake Urumiah, about lat. 38° 4′ N., long. 46° 16′ E.; the second city of Persia, and its chief commercial emporium. It is on the main route between Teheran and Turkey and Russia. Among the buildings are the citadel and "Blue Mosque." It is noted for its orchards and gardens. It has often been devastated by sieges and earthquakes. Population, 180,000.

Tacanas (tä-kä'näs). Indians of north-central Bolivia, between the rivers Beni and Madre de Dios. They are divided into many small tribes, some of which have been gathered into the Reyes missions. The wild tribes are, to some extent, agricultural, and the women weave cotton cloths; but they are said to be very savage, and to be fond of human flesh. Among the principal tribes are the Caimas, Toromonas, Araonas proper, Macanas, and Maropas. Their language appears to constitute a distinct stock.

Tacchinardi (tak-ke-när'dē), Niccolo. Born at Leghorn, Sept., 1776; died at Florence, March 14, 1859. A noted Italian bass singer. He appeared first in opera in 1804, made a brilliant success in Rome and other cities, and visited Paris in 1811. In 1814 he returned to Italy, and was appointed by Murat to the Grand Duke of Tuscany. He retired from the stage in 1831, and became celebrated as a teacher.

Taché (tä-shā'), Alexandre Antonine. Born at Rivière-du-Loup, Canada, July 25, 1823; died at Winnipeg, Manitoba, June 22, 1894. A Canadian archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church, brother of E. P. Taché; distinguished for his early missionary labors among the Indians. He became bishop of St. Boniface in 1853, and archbishop in 1871, when the see was made a metropolitan see. He mediated between the Canadian government and the Métis in 1870. He is well known as a Roman Catholic controversialist. He published "Manuel de l'Amérique" (1859), translated into English.

Taché, Sir Étienne Paschal. Born at St. Thomas, Lower Canada, Sept. 5, 1795; died there, July 29, 1865. A Canadian politician. He entered Parliament in 1841, and was commissioner of public works 1848–49, and speaker of the legislative council 1856–57.

Tacitus (tas'i-tus), Cornelius. Born about 55 A. D.; died probably after 117. A celebrated Roman historian and noted legal orator. He was pretor in 88 and consul in 97. He was a friend of the younger Pliny. Taillefer (täy-fär'). Killed at the battle of Senlac, 1066. A Norman trouvère in the invading army of William of Normandy.

> Before the two armies met hand to hand, a juggler or minstrel, known as Taillefer, the Cheaver of Iron, rode forth from the Norman ranks as if to defy the whole force of England in his single person. He cast up his sword, and the Duke's leave to strike the first blow; he rode forth singing songs of Roland and of Charlemagne — so soon had the name and exploits of the great German become the spoil of the enemy. He threw his sword into the air and caught it again; but he presently showed that he could use warlike weapons for other purposes than for jugglers' tricks of this kind: he pierced one Englishman with his lance, he struck down another with his sword, and then himself fell beneath the blows of their comrades. A bravado of this kind might serve as an omen, it might stir up the spirits of men on either side; but it could in no other way affect the fate of the battle.

He graduated with the highest honors from the college Bourbon in Paris, and was admitted in the first rank to the Ecole Normale in 1848. He maintained this high standing throughout his course, and was then an professor into the provinces. He soon returned to Paris. Anxious to broaden his knowledge of science, he took a three years' course in medicine. In this time he accumulated an extensive fund of information, and began to publish works that brought him into notice. In 1853 he took his doctor's degree before the Faculty of Letters in Paris; as a dissertation he presented the work entitled "Essai sur les fables de La Fontaine." other essays by Taine are on Livy (1854), on Carlyle (v.), "L'Idealisme anglais," 1864), and on Stuart Mill (v.), "Le positivisme anglais," 1864). He composed also a volume of "Essais de critique et d'histoire" (1857) and another entitled "Nouveaux essais de critique et d'histoire" (1865). In 1864 he accepted the chair of esthetics at the Ecole des Beaux Arts. His course of lectures appeared as "L'Ideal dans l'art" (1867). Other works of the same nature are "Philosophie de l'art" (1865), "id. en Italie" (1866), "id. aux Pays-Bas" (1868). His personal experiences and impressions about men and things both at home and abroad are related in his "Voyage aux Pyrénées" (1855), "Voyage en Italie" (1866), "Notes sur Paris ou vie et opinions de M. Frederic-Thomas Graindorge" (1867), and "Notes sur l'Angleterre" (1872). Lastly came the series of brilliant works that have chiefly made his reputation. These are "Les philosophes classiques du 19th siècle en France" (1856), "Histoire de la littérature anglaise" (1864–65), "De l'Intelligence" (1870), and "Les origines de la France contemporaine" (in three parts: "L'Ancien régime," "La révolution" "Le regime moderne" (1875–93). The University of Oxford conferred upon Taine the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1871, and the French Academy elected him to membership Nov. 11, 1878.

Tainos (tī'nōs). [From taino, chiefs (the name which they gave themselves).] The ancient Indian inhabitants of the island of Haiti. Their number is conjectural but all accounts agree that the island was very populous. They are described as a race of agriculturists, going nearly naked, and living in small villages: their chiefs had little power, except in war. The island was divided among several tribes or subtribes, inhabiting districts which the Spaniards called provinces. The tribes in the eastern district are said to be more warlike than the others, perhaps from admixture of Carib blood. Those of the northern coast were very friendly to Columbus in 1492, and the subsequent uprisings appear to have been provoked entirely by Spanish cruelty. Wars with the whites and the slavery to which they were reduced soon destroyed the tribes, and their blood is seen only in the mixed races of the Dominican Republic. The few words of their language which have come down to us show that they belonged to the stock of Maypure Arawak.

Taiping, or Taeping (tī'ping'). Rebellion. [Chinese, from Tai, a form of ta, great, and p'ing, peace.] The great rebellion inaugurated in southern China in 1850 by one Hung-siu-tsuen, who, calling himself the "Heavenly Prince," pretended that he had a divine mission to overturn the Manchu dynasty and set up a purely native dynasty, to be styled the Tai-p'ing Chao, or 'Great-peace Dynasty.' As the cue had been imposed (about 1644) upon the Chinese by the Manchus as an outward expression of loyalty to the Tatar dynasty, but Taipings discarded the cue, and hence were styled by the Chinese Chang-mau-tsch, or "long-haired rebels. Hung-sin-tsuen also promulgated a kind of spurious Christianity, in which God (Shangti) was known as the "Heavenly Father, "and Jesus Christ as the "Heavenly Elder Brother." The insurrection was suppressed about 1864, largely with the aid of the "Ever victorious Army" under Colonel Gordon, who from that time became known as "Chinese Gordon."

His church, known as the Brooklyn Tabernacle, was built 1870, burned 1872, rebuilt 1873–74, burned 1889, again rebuilt on a new site, and again burned May, 1894. He has edited the "Christian at Work," the "Daily Advance," "Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine," etc. Among his works are "Crumbs Swept Up" (1870), "Abominations of Modern Society" (1872), "Around the Tea-Table" (1874), "Marvels Out" (1879), "The Brooklyn Tabernacle: a Collection of 104 Sermons" (1884), "The Marriage Ring" (1890), "Woman: Her Powers and Privileges" (1888), etc.

Talmud (tal'mud). [From Heb. lamad, to learn —study, doctrine.] The monumental work which contains the Jewish traditional or oral laws and regulations of life explanatory of the written law of the Pentateuch as applied to the various and varying conditions and circumstances of life, and developed by logical conclusions, analogies, and combinations. It receives the second degree the Talmud contains comments on the historical, poetical, and ethical portions of the Scriptures, in a homiletical spirit. This latter part is called Haggada or Agada (from nagad, Ar. hadā, make known—narrative, tale), while the former, or legislative, part, which comprises all the rules of life, is called Halacha (from halach, to go, walk—the path or way of life as ruled and directed by the law). The Talmud may be externally divided into the Mishnah and Gemara. The relation of one to the other is that of exposition to thesis. The Mishnah (meaning repetition) is the text or thesis; the Gemara presents the discussion and debate on it. The authors of the Mishnah are called Tenaim (doctors); they were preceded by the Soferim (scribes). The activity of the Tenaim began in the time of the Maccabees, and their rules and decisions, nearly 4,000 in number, were codified and arranged according to subjects (see under Rabbinical Literature). The Mishnah is composed in Hebrew, not Aramaic, or "New Hebrew," as the Gemara mainly is. Neither the Jerusalem nor the Babylonian Talmud contains the complete Gemara to the entire Mishnah; but the Babylonian Talmud is about four times as voluminous as that of Jerusalem. The Babylonian Talmud obtained greater popularity and authority (over the Jewish mind) than that of Jerusalem, and is always meant when the Talmud is spoken of without a qualification. Its 63 tracts are usually printed in 12 folio volumes (or 19 octavo). The Mishnah is sometimes separately printed in 6 volumes, according to its division into 6 orders or sedarim; and also the portions of the Hagada under the title of Ain Yakob. See Agada, Amoraim, Gemara, Mishnah.

Talos (tā'los). [Gr. Τάλως.] In Greek legend, an inventor, nephew of Dædalus by whom he was slain. See Dædalus.—2. A man of brass, constructed by Hephæstus for Minos to guard the island of Crete.

Population (1890), 2,856,000.—2. The capital of the government of Tamboff, situated on the Tsna about lat. 52° 45′ N. Population (1890), 40,876.

Tamburlaine (or Tamberlane) the Great, or the Scythian Shepherd and the Scourge of God. A tragedy in two parts, by Marlowe, acted in 1587, and printed on the "Stationers' Register" and printed in 1590. It is his earliest play, and the first in which blank verse was introduced on the public stage. See Tamerlane and Tomyris Tartar.

Mr. C. H. Herford and Mr. A. Wagner have investigated the authorities from which Marlowe drew his conception of Tamburlaine's character and history. They show, at some length, and at the cost of considerable research, that Marlowe was indebted to the lives of Timur by Pedro Mexia the Spaniard and Petrus Perondus. Mexia's "Silva de varia lecion," published at Seville in 1543, obtained great popularity, and was translated into Italian, French, and English. The English translation, known as Fortescue's "The Foreste," appeared in 1571; and there can be little doubt but that the book was an early favourite of Marlowe's. Bullen, Introd. to Marlowe's Works, p. xxii.

The subject of "Tamburlaine," . . . if we would express it in the simplest way, is mere lust of dominion, the passion of "a mighty hunter before the Lord" for sovereign sway, the love of power in its crudest shape. This, and this alone, living and acting in the person of the Scythian shepherd, gives unity to the multitude of scenes which grow up before us and fall away. . . . There is no construction in "Tamburlaine." Instead of two plays there might as well have been twenty, if Marlowe could have found it in his heart to husband his large supply of kings, emperors, and princes, pashas, governors, and boys who perish before the Scourge of God, or had he been able to discover empires, provinces, and principalities with which to endow a new race of rulers. The play ends from sheer exhaustion of resources.

Dowden, Transcripts and Studies, p. 44.

Taming of the Shrew, The. A comedy by Shakspere, produced in 1603 and printed in 1623: altered from "The Taming of a Shrew" printed in 1594. The earlier play was not by Shakspere, but by some one else (Marlowe and Kyd have been suggested) for Pembroke's company in 1588-89. The version altered by Shakspere was by Lodge (Fleay). See Katherine and Petruchio, Sauncy the Seal, Cobbler of Preston, Woman's Prize, Jacke o' Wicc and Have a Wife, and The Homelesman, all of which are more or less based on this play.

Tamise (tä-mēz'). A manufacturing town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Schelde 20 miles north-northwest of Brussels. Population (1890), 11,039.

Tammany Hall (tam'a-ni hâl'). [From the conventional spelling of the name of a sachem of the Delaware Indians who sold land to William Penn. In the aboriginal tongue his name means 'the Affable,' and tradition credits him with being a lover of peace; further than this, the legends and adventures attached to his name are the invention of members of different American societies which held May-day festivals in Maryland and Pennsylvania before and after the Revolution, and, adopting the sachem as their patron saint, commonly described themselves as "Sons of St. Tammany."] A New York political organization, having its headquarters in Tammany Hall, the property of the "Tammany Society or Columbian Order." The latter was founded in New York city on May 12, 1789, with benevolent and fraternal purposes. In general opposition to the Federalists the Tammany Society became identified with the Republicans (now the Democratic party), and took an active part in the campaign of 1800, which resulted in the choice of Thomas Jefferson for President. In 1805 the society was incorporated. While adhering to its original character as a secret social organization, with a governing council of sachems and a ritual with aboriginal flavor, the Tammany Society grew in public influence, and in 1811 built the original Tammany Hall at Frankfort street, fronting by City Hall Park. Since then a local political party, favored by a majority of the members of the Tammany Society, has always had its headquarters in the house of the Society, and has been popularly known as "Tammany Hall"—the present hall, erected in 1867, being on 14th street, between Irving Place and Third Avenue. Although in theory the Tammany Hall General Committee has no relation to the Tammany Society save as tenant of the latter's edifice, in practice they are coordinate branches of one political system, the Society being in effect the citadel of the controlling spirits of the Tammany Hall party. Tammany Hall purports to be the regular Democratic organization of the city and county of New York, though that claim has often been contested. By means of a highly organized system of Tammany clubs and assembly-district associations, it has usually held a paramount place in city politics. In 1893, Tammany Hall, controlled virtually by one man, was in possession of every important office and avenue of public employment pertaining to the municipal administration.

Tammerfors (täm'mer-fors). A manufacturing town in the government of Tavastehus, Finland, situated between two lakes 105 miles north-northwest of Helsingfors. Population (1890), 20,489.

Tannhäuser (tän'hoi-zer). [MHG. Der Tan-hūser.] A Middle High German lyric poet of the 13th century. He belonged to the noble family of Tanhusen. From about 1240 to 1270 he led a wandering life in which he came in contact with the Babenbergs and other courts, and visited the far East. He was a minnesinger and the writer, particularly, of dance-songs. A German ballad of the 16th century has preserved the memory of the historical Tannhäuser. This first describes his parting with Lady Venus, with whom he has been for a year in the Venusberg. He makes a visit of penance to Rome and asks for absolution, but Pope Urban, who holds a dry staff in his hand, declares that as little as the staff can grow green, so little can he have God's mercy. In despair he goes away. On the third day after, the staff, however, begins to bud, and the Pope sends out in search of him; but he has gone back to Venus in the mountain. The legend of Tannhäuser is the subject of the opera of the same name by Richard Wagner.

Tannhäuser und der Sängerkrieg auf Wartburg. An opera by Wagner, founded on the legend of Tannhäuser, produced at Dresden in 1845, and in England in 1876.

Tantalus (tan'ta-lus). [Gr. Τάνταλος.] In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus and Pluto, and father of Pelops and Niobe: king of Mount Sipylus in Lydia. Owing to the accounts of the gods he was condemned to stand in Tartarus up to his chin in water under a loaded fruit-tree, the fruit and water retreating whenever he sought to satisfy his hunger or thirst. From his name is derived the word tantalize.

Tantra (tan'tra). [Skt., 'loom, thread, warp,' and then 'order of rites, theory, treatise.'] In Sanskrit literature, a religious treatise teaching magical formulas for the worship of the gods or the attainment of superhuman power. The Tantras are the Bible of Shaktism, which took, like the Puranas, they are sometimes called a fifth Veda. They are also known as Agama, 'that which has come down' (as supplied by the Brahmans) from the Veda), in distinction from Nigama, a general name for the Vedas, Dharmashastras, Puranas, and other Smriti literature. Their authorship is sometimes ascribed to Dattatreya, who is worshiped as an incarnation of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva; but they are generally thought to have been revealed by Shiva alone. None has as yet been printed or translated in Europe. They are said to number 64, without counting many works of a Tantrik character. They are generally written in the form of a dialogue between Shiva and his consort Parvati, whom he ought in theory to treat of five subjects: the creation, the destruction of the world, the worship of the gods, the attainment of superhuman power, and the four modes of union with the Supreme Spirit. Whole Tantras treat only of various modes of using spells for acquiring magical power; others simply describe the most effective modes of worshiping the Shaktis. The oldest known Tantra cannot antedate the 6th or 7th century A. D. Full as they are of doubtful symbolism, and tending in their teaching to licentiousness, they are on all accounts impure. They seem connected with a distorted view of the Sankhya philosophy and with some corrupt forms of Buddhism. They have greatly influenced the later Buddhist literature of Nepal. There are also Vaishnava Tantras, such as the Gautamiya and the Sanatkumara; but even in these Shiva is the speaker and Hari the listener. In them Radha, the wife of Krishna, takes the place of Durga as the chief object of worship.

Tarascos (tä-räs'kōs), or Tarascans (tä-räs'-kanz). An Indian race of Mexico, formerly a powerful nation which occupied the territory now included in the state of Michoacan. According to tradition they came from the north about the time of the Aztec migration, establishing their capital at Tzintzuntzan on the Lake of Patzcuaro. Their language was entirely distinct from the Nahuatl, forming in itself a linguistic stock. In civilization they far advanced in civilization as the Aztecs, building temples and houses of cut stone, weaving cotton for clothing, and using a very complete defensive armor in war; their calendar was similar to that of the Mexicans, and they had a form of picture-writing no specimen of which has been preserved. Human sacrifices were made to their gods and at funerals. Their chief deity was Curicaneri, said to have symbolized the sun. Their chiefs (called kings by the Spaniards) were elected and had considerable power. The Tarascos were frequently at war with the Aztecs, and were never conquered by them. They submitted without resistance to the Spaniards; but, notwithstanding this, Nuño de Guzman tortured and killed their last king, Tangoxoan. Under Hidalgo they were the first to revolt against the Spaniards in 1810, thus opening the war for independence, in which they fought bravely. About 275,000 Tarascos survive, principally in Michoacan, with outlying villages in Guerrero and Jalisco.

Targum (tär'gum). [Aram., 'interpretation.'] The name applied to the Chaldean (i. e., Aramean) versions of the Old Testament. They developed out of the oral translations and paraphrases of the passages of scripture read in the synagogues: a custom which probably began soon after the return of the Jews from the captivity. The most popular Targum is that which passes under the name of Onkelos, which originated probably in the 3d century A. D. in Babylonia: the name is supposed to be a corruption of Aquila (Akylas), the celebrated convert and author of a Greek version of the Old Testament, to whom it was ascribed. It gives in general a faithful translation of the Hebrew text. Another Targum is attributed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a disciple of Hillel, which is more free in its rendering of the original; while the so-called Jerusalem Targum ("pseudo-Jonathan") is more of a homiletical paraphrase than a translation. None of these Targums is in its present shape a complete translation of the Old Testament.

Tarifa (tä-rē'fä). A seaport and fishing town in the province of Cadiz, Spain, situated on the Strait of Gibraltar in lat. 36° N.; the Punic Josa and Roman Julia Traducta. An English general, notorious in the Revolution for his cruelty as a partizan commander in the Carolinas (1780–81). He organized the "British Legion" of regulars and Tories; served at Camden; defeated Sumter at Fishing Creek, and was defeated by him at Blackstock's Hill Nov. 20, 1780; was defeated by Morgan at the Cowpens in Jan., 1781, and surrendered with Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was later member of Parliament and lieutenant-general. He wrote a "History of the Campaigns of 1780–81, etc." (1787).

Tarleton (tärl'ton), Richard. Died at London, 1588. A famous clown and comic actor. He is said to have been brought to London from Shoreditch, and to have been a "prentice to his wealth of the city of London, later a "water-bearer." He was enrolled afterward as one of the twelve of the queen's company, and became a kind of court jester as well. He was celebrated for his extemporaneous rimes and for his "jigs" (comic songs with a dance), which he invented. His popularity and audacity were both unbounded. He fell into disgrace and was dismissed from court by scurrilous reflections upon Leicester and Raleigh. He then kept a tavern in Paternoster Row, and later the Saher in Gracechurch street. He died of the Seven Beads, which Fuller says appears to have been the result of his real or pretended repentance of his irregularities.

Tasso (täs'ō; It. pron. täs'sō), Bernardo. Born at Venice, Nov. 11, 1493; died at Ostiglia, Sept. 4, 1569. An Italian poet, father of Torquato Tasso. His chief work is the romantic poem "L'Amadigi" ("Amadis," 1560), in octave stanzas.

Tasso, Torquato. [F. Le Tasse.] Born at Sorrento, Italy, March 11, 1544; died at Rome, April 25, 1595. A celebrated Italian poet. He was educated at the Jesuit schools at Naples, Rome, and Bergamo. His father, Bernardo Tasso, was involved in the troubles of the Prince of Salerno, his patron, and joined the prince in Rome; but, that city becoming unsafe for him, he accepted shelter at Pesaro, the court of the Duke of Urbino. Here his son Torquato was taught with the son of the duke. In 1557 Torquato went to study law at Padua. He was influenced by his father's writings and not to his advice, and in 1562, while still at Padua, published "Rinaldo." It was successful, and, his father ceasing his opposition to a literary career, Tasso went to Bergamo to study philosophy and literature. He returned to Padua shortly after, and by 1566 was attached to the service of the house of Este: the glories of which he celebrated in "Gerusalemme Liberata"). Rinaldo was said to be of that race. He was well received at court, and was encouraged to finish the epic "Goffredo" (later called "Gerusalemme Liberata"), which he had begun at Bologna. In 1571 Cardinal Luigi d'Este, his patron, went to Paris, taking Tasso with him. There he met Ronsard and other distinguished men. He left the cardinal after his return on account of differences in religious opinion, but was received by Duke Alfonso of Ferrara, who loaded him with favors. He produced his "Aminta" in 1573, and had written 18 cantos of "Goffredo" in 1574, when he was seized with fever. After this his mind was not clear: he became quarrelsome, worried himself about the orthodoxy of his poem, and became subject to delusions which finally terminated in the belief that he was an unpardonable heretic. At length he was placed in a convent at Ferrara for medical treatment. He escaped and fled to his sister in the Kingdom of Naples, but was cared for there, and in 1578 the duke received him again; but his delusions continued, and he was dered from place to place (to Mantua, Turin, Rome, Florence, Loreto, Ferrara). There he became so violent in accusing the duke of a design to poison him that he was placed in an insane asylum. After he had remained there for seven years he was released, on the personal promise of the Prince of Mantua that the duke should not again be exposed to his insane attacks. A theory has obtained credit that Tasso was kept up in an asylum on account of his aspirations for the hand of Leonora d'Este, the duke's sister, and Goethe's play was based on this supposition. "Goffredo" was published at Venice during his confinement (1581), but was very inaccurately printed, and in 1581 a revised edition was printed at Parma with its present title ("Gerusalemme Liberata"). The "Gerusalemme Liberata" was published at Mantua, wrote "Torrismondo" (1586), and again resumed his wanderings. He had many friends eager to help him, but was broken in health and spirits. His "Gerusalemme Conquistata," much inferior to the "Gerusalemme Liberata," was published in 1593. Two years later he died at Rome, whither he had been summoned by Pope Clement VIII. to be crowned poet laureate: the ceremony was never performed, owing to his illness. The "Gerusalemme Liberata" has been translated into many languages. The most famous English translation is that of Fairfax (1600).

The water was the best on the island of Manhattan about the beginning of the 18th century, and was highly prized by housewives for making tea. Before the Revolution the old spring was a popular resort. A pump was erected, ornamental grounds were laid out, but the wealth and health of the city gathered there on summer evenings to sip the water, fortified by other beverages.

Teazle (tē'zl), Lady. A gay and innocent but imprudent country-bred girl in Sheridan's "School for Scandal." Married to an old man, she plunges into the temptations of town life. Mrs. Abington, the creator of the part, made her an entirely affected fine lady, giving no hint of her rustic origin. Mrs. Jordan was the first who allowed a trace of country breeding to be visible through the glitter of her artificial town manner.

When the veterans in the art of scandal are joined by a brilliant and mischievous recruit in the shape of Lady Teazle, crushing them in pure opéra-bouffe earnest, the enjoyment of her young onslaught outdoes them all. The talk has never been so brilliant, never so pitiless, as when she joins them. She adds the gift of mimicry to all their malice. Mrs. Oliphant, Sheridan.

Teazle, Sir Peter. The husband of Lady Teazle in Sheridan's "School for Scandal." He is "something of a curmudgeon" in the first act, but improves on acquaintance, and secures the affection of his young wife at the play.

Tegernsee (tā'gern-sā). A lake in Upper Bavaria, situated near the Alps 20 miles south of Munich: noted for its beautiful scenery. Its outlet is by the Mangfall to the Inn. Length, nearly 5 miles. Height, 2,400 feet.

Tegetthoff (te'get-hof), Baron Wilhelm von. Born at Marburg, Styria, Dec. 23, 1827; died at Vienna, April 7, 1871. An Austrian admiral. He commanded the Austrian contingent in the allied naval victory over the Danes near Helgoland May 9, 1864; and is especially noted for his victory near Lissa over the Italian fleet July 20, 1866.

Tegner (teng-nār'), Esaias. Born in Kyrkerud, in Wermland, Sweden, Nov. 13, 1782; died at Wexiö, Nov. 2, 1846. A Swedish poet. He was the son of a clergyman, both parents were from the peasant class. He studied at Lund, which city he finally left, and left the family in extremely poor circumstances. Friends enabled him to obtain his early education, and in 1799 he went as a student to Lund. The following year, lack of means to continue his studies, he became a tutor in Småland, but subsequently returned to Lund, where he finally took his examination in 1802. In 1803 he was appointed professor of Greek, but ten years later he was made professor of Greek and philosophy. In 1824 he was elected bishop of Wexiö. Subsequently he was twice elected member of the national diet, and in the autumn of 1840 until the following spring he was in an asylum in Schleswig. He then resumed the duties of his office, but never entirely recovered health. His literary career began with the "Kriigsang fraden Skånska landskarnet" ("War Song for the Militia of Scania"). In 1811 he was awarded the prize of the Swedish Academy for his "Svea," which was followed by "Nattvardsbarnen" ("The Children of the Lord's Supper") appeared in 1820; this was followed two years later by "Axel," which was crowned by the Swedish Academy. Its subject is taken from the twelfth romance in the old Norse saga of the same name (see Thithrek Saga), has most celebrated work, and one of famous in Scandinavian literature. He wrote numerous short poems, among them "Karl XII." ("Charles XII") and "Sångerskan" ("Hymn to the Sun"). His "Frithiofs Saga" (1825) is his masterpiece. It was left unfinished. His last poem written a short time before his death, is "Askeladd min lyra" ("Farewell to My Lyre"). Many of his poems are based on the old Gothic model. His collected works were published at Stockholm, 1826, in 7 vols. His posthumous works appeared at Stockholm, 1857–64, in 6 vols.

Tegnum (teg'num). See the extract.

His [Galen's] greatest medical works were the treatise, in seventeen books, on the use of the parts of the human body"; the essay "on the art of medicine," which was the text-book and chief subject of examination for medical students in the middle ages, when it was known in barbarous Latin as the Tegnum; and a treatise, also well known in the middle ages, on the temperaments, which contained the pharmacopœia of Archigenes, and which is a text-book with the Arabic physicians under the name Mizamir, or "the book of ten treatises."

Telamon

He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the Argonautic expedition, and accompanied Hercules against Laomedon of Troy.

Telamon, In ancient geography, a place on the coast of Etruria, Italy, about 76 miles northwest of Rome. Near here, in 225 B. C., the Romans nearly annihilated an army of Gauls.

Telde (tel'da). A town in the island of Gran Canaria, Canary Islands.

Tel- (or Tell-) Defenneh (tel-dā-fen'ne). See the extract.

Tell Defenneh is a large mound, or group of mounds, situated close to Lake Menzaleh, at the extreme northeastern corner of the Delta; and the name of this group of mounds, "Defenneh," is a corrupt Arab version of "Daphne," the "Daphne of Pelusium" of the Greek historians. The identity of Defenneh and Daphne has never been questioned by scholars, and the identity of both with the Biblical Tahpanhes has also been admitted by the majority of Bible commentators. Here Mr. Petrie discovered the ruins of "Pharaoh's House at Tahpanhes."
Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 58.

Telegonia (tel-e-gō'ni-ā), or Lay of Telegonus. A cyclic poem by Eugamon of Cyrene (about 566 B. C.). It was a continuation of the Odyssey, and was named from its hero Telegonus, son of Odysseus and Circe, who slew his father. The poem completed the "Trojan cycle."

Telegonus (te-leg'ō-nus). [Gr. Τηλέγονος.] In Greek legend: (a) A son of Proteus, slain by Hercules. (b) A son of Odysseus and Circe. He was sent by his mother to Ithaca, where he killed Odysseus and whence he returned to Circe with Telemachus and Penelope. The latter he married. He was said to have been the founder of Tusculum and Præneste.

Tel- (or Tell-) el-Amarna (tel-i-ä-mär'nä). The ruins of a residence of Amenophis IV., in central Egypt. In the winter of 1887-88 there were discovered here about three hundred clay tablets covered with cuneiform inscriptions which have since been deciphered: they contain the diplomatic correspondence of Kings of Babylonia, Assyria, and other countries of western Asia including Palestine, with the Egyptian court.

Tel- (or Tell-) el-Kebir (tel-el-ke-bēr'). A village in Lower Egypt, situated on the Freshwater Canal about 50 miles northeast of Cairo. Here, Sept. 13, 1882, the British under Wolseley defeated the Egyptian insurgents under Arabi Pasha: loss of the latter, about 3,000. The surrender of Arabi Pasha followed.

Telemachus (te-lem'a-kus). [Gr. Τηλέμαχος.] In Greek legend, the son of Odysseus and Penelope. He visited Pylos (attended by Athene in the guise of Mentor) and Sparta, in search of his father, and joined the latter, on his return to Ithaca, in slaying the suitors of Penelope.

Telemchus. An Asiatic monk, famous for his attempt in 404 to stop the gladiatorial shows. He sprang into the arena and endeavored to separate the gladiators, but was stoned to death by the spectators. He was promptly martyred by the emperor Honorius; and his act and death led to the abolition of the exhibitions.

Télémaque (tā-lā-mäk'), Aventures de. [F., 'Adventures of Telemachus.'] A romance by Fénelon, published in 1699. It is founded on the legendary history of Telemachus, and is one of the classics of French literature.

Though the beautiful fiction of Telemachus, which has intich in common with, and was doubtless suggested to Fenelon by the Argenis, be rather an epic poem in prose than a romance, it seems to have led the way to several political romances, or, at least, to have nourished a taste for this species of composition.
Hallam, Hist. of Prose Fict., II. 348.

Telemarken (tā-lā-mär'ken). A mountainous and picturesque region in the east of Bratsberg, southern Norway.

Telephus (tel'e-fus). [Gr. Τήλεφος.] In Greek legend, the son of Hercules and Auge: king of Mysia at the time of the Greek expedition against Troy.

Telescopium (tel-e-skō'pi-um). A southern constellation, introduced by Lacaille in 1752. It contains one star of the fourth magnitude. Telescopium Herschelii is a constellation inserted by the Abbé Rellet in 1789 between Lynx, Auriga, and Gemini. It is obsolete.

Telford (tel'fōrd), Thomas. Born at Eskdale, Dumfriesshire, Aug. 9, 1757: died at Westminster, Sept. 2, 1834. A Scottish civil engineer. He built the bridge across the Severn at Montford in 1792; was engineer of the Ellesmere Canal (1793), the Caledonian Canal (1802), the Gloucester and Berkeley Canal (1818), and the Grand Trunk Canal (1823); and in 1810 superintended the construction of the Gotha Canal, Sweden. From 1803 he superintended the construction of nearly 1,000 miles of road in the Highlands of Scotland, and afterward constructed lines of road through North Wales, surmounting great natural difficulties. The most notable parts of this undertaking were the erection of the Menai suspension-bridge and the Conway bridge. He built the road from Warsaw to Brest-Litowski in Poland. He improved the harbors of Aberdeen and Dundee, and built St. Catherines docks in London. In 1828-30 he drained nearly 50,000 acres of the fen country. The Telford pavement was his invention.

Tell (tel), The. That part of Algeria which lies along the coast of the Mediterranean, and comprises the cultivated land. The name is extended to include the similarly placed regions of Morocco and Tunis.

Tell (tel), William. One of the legendary heroes of Switzerland in the struggle for independence of the cantons Schwyz, Uri, and Unterwalden with Albrecht of Austria (the German emperor Albrecht I.). The story, in its familiar form, is that Tell, who was the head of the independent confederates, having refused to salute the cap which Gessler, the Austrian governor, had placed for that purpose in the market-place of Altorf, was ordered to place an apple on the head of his little son and shoot it off. He did so, and revealed another arrow with which he had intended to kill Gessler if he had killed his son. He was taken across the lake by Gessler to Kussnacht Castle to be eaten alive by reptiles; but, a storm coming up, he shot the governor, escaped, and afterward liberated his country. The Tell legend in its essence form appears for the first time in a chronicle, written between 1467 and 1476, contained in a manuscript known as the "White Book of Sarnen," which places the events after the accession of Rudolf to the empire in 1273. It is also found in the "Chronicle" of Melchior Russ of Lucerne, who began to write in 1482. The principal source, however, of the life and exploits of Tell is the "Chronicon Helveticum" ("Swiss Chronicle") of Ægidius Tschudi (1505-72), where the year 1307 is given as the date of the Tell incident. Egid Tschudi's friend Johann Stumpf in Schiller's drama "Wilhelm Tell" (1804), which closely follows the episode as related by the Swiss chronicler, and even incorporates some of the touches used for work. The legend of William Tell is in its ultimate origin a Germanic myth. The earliest extant version of this story of the apple is contained in the 6th century Gesta Danorum, from the Icelandic whose material, however, according to its own account, was derived from German sources. The story of the famous shot of the archer Hedi is here related with circumstantial detail. At the coronation of King Nidung an apple is placed upon the head of the three-year-old son of Hedi, who is then made to shoot, and strikes it, directly in the sight of which he had first aimed. The boy, who had taken two other arrows when only one shot was allowed, he replied boldly, "In order to shoot the king if I had injured my son." The Tell legend of the legend is found in Saxo Grammaticus, who wrote his "Historia Danica" early in the 13th century. The apple-shot is also told in English territory of Toki of Wideslee, Tell's successor of William Tell is simply a localization of the legend, which was, apparently, once common Germanic property.

Tellé (tel'ā), Henry Moore. Born at Granger, Allegheny County, N. Y., May 23, 1830. An American lawyer and Republican politician. He was United States senator from Colorado 1876-82; secretary of the interior 1882-85; and United States senator from Colorado 1885-.

Tellez (tel'yäth), Gabriel: pseudonym Tirso de Molina. Born at Madrid about 1570: died in the convent of Soria, 1648. A noted Spanish dramatist. He entered the church before 1613, and became the head of the convent of Soria. Five volumes of his plays were published at Madrid independently between 1616 and 1636: among these the best-known out of Spain is "El Burlador de Sevilla" ("The Seville Deceiver"), "the original" of the exhibition of Don Juan which has now seen on every stage in Europe." In Spain "Don Gil de las Calzas Verdes" ("Don Gil in the Green Pantaloons") is the favorite. Among his other plays may be mentioned "Vergonzoso en Palacio" ("A Bashful Man at Court"), "La Lealtad contra la Envidia," "Por el Sotano y el Torno," and "Escarmientos para Querbos." Rafael del Valle ("Cronica de Tirso") gives an account of entertainments given by a wedding party at a cigarral or small country house resorted to for recreation in summer. These were stories told, plays acted, poetry recited, and even a theatrical framework being used to connect the separate parts instead of the narrative adopted by Boccaccio in the Decameron," from which the idea was taken. This style was soon imitated by other authors. Tirso published another of a graver tone, "Pleasure and Profit," in 1635.

Tellez y Giron (tel-yäth' ē hē-rōn'), Pedro, Duke of Osuna (or Ossuna). Born at Valladolid, Spain, 1579: died 1624. A Spanish statesman, viceroy of Sicily 1611-15, and of Naples 1616-20.

Tello, or Tel-loh (tel-lō'). A site in Chaldea excavated by De Sarzec between 1877 and 1881. These explorations have shed a new light upon the development of Mesopotamian art by supplying a series of well-dated monuments of architecture and sculpture which can be dated. The site is believed to be the ancient Sirpulla. Its remains form a number of the low mounds produced by the degradation of Mesopotamian platforms and buildings in unburned brick, spread over a space nearly 2 miles long. The sculpture which is more direct in spirit and more lifelike than that of the later Babylonian and Assyrian art, reached its best period about 2500 B. C.; but much that is older and more primitive has been found. The architecture already exhibits the later types, though in simpler form. The chief portable remains are in the Louvre.

Tellsplatte (tels-plät'te). [G., 'Tell's slab.'] A stone on the Axenberg, north of Flüelen, on the eastern bank of the Lake of Lucerne.

Tempest, The

William Tell, according to the legend, sprang out of Gessler's boat.

Tellus (tel'us). [L., 'earth.'] In Roman mythology, a goddess, the personification of the earth.

Telmessus (tel-mes'us). In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Lycia, Asia Minor, in lat. 36° 36' N., long. 29° 10' E., on the site of the modern village of Makri. Among the important antiquities on its site is an ancient theater, well preserved and of good style. The cavea is semicircular, with one precinction: its diameter is 254 feet, that of the orchestra 92. The stage structure measures 141 by 46 feet.

Teman (tē'man). ['South,' properly 'the country to the right.'] The southern district and people of Edom (Idumea); from Teman, the grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11-15).

Teme (tēm). A river on the boundary between Wales and England, and in western England, which joins the Severn 3 miles south of Worcester. Length, about 70 miles.

Téméraire (tā-mā-rār'). 1. Aline-of-battle ship of 98 guns, called "the Fighting Téméraire," captured from the French at the battle of the Nile, Aug. 1, 1798. She fought next to the Victory in the line at the battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805, under Captain Harvey. She was broken up in 1838. Turner's picture of "the Fighting Téméraire" was exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1839.

2. A British armored war-ship, launched in 1876. Her dimensions are: length, 385 feet; breadth, 62 feet; draught, 27 feet; displacement, 8,540 tons. She has an armored water-line belt 11 inches thick, and a central sponsoned citadel with armor 10.8 inches thick. She has a 25-ton guns mounted en barbette fore and aft upon the upper deck.

Temes (tem-esh'). A river in southern Hungary which joins the Danube 8 miles east of Belgrad. Length, about 250 miles.

Temeser Banat (tem-esh'er ban'at). A former administrative division, comprising the present counties of Temes, Krassó, and Torontál, in Hungary.

Temesvár (tem-esh-vär'). A free city, capital of the county of Temes, Hungary, situated on the Bega Canal in lat. 45° 47' N., long. 21° 13' E. It consists of the city proper, or fortress, and several suburbs. It is an administrative and military center. Among its buildings is a Roman Catholic cathedral, and a castle built in the middle of the 15th century. Temesvár was besieged and taken by the Turks in 1552; and was several times fruitlessly besieged, but finally taken, by Prince Eugene in 1716 and reunited to Hungary. It was made a royal free city in 1781. It was defended by the Austrians against the Hungarian insurgents in 1849, who were defeated by Haynau Aug. 9, 1849. Population (1880), 39,850.

Temiscaming (te-mis'ka-ming), Lake. A lake on the border line between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, Canada, intersected by lat. 47° 30' N. Its outlet is the Ottawa River. Length, about 26 miles.

Temiscouata (tem-is-kō-ā'tā), Lake. A lake in Temiscouata County, Quebec, Canada, east of Quebec. Its outlet is the Madawaska River. Length, about 22 miles.

Temme (tem'me), Jodocus Donatus Hubertus. Born at Lette, Westphalia, Oct. 22, 1798: died at Zurich, Dec. 4, 1881. A German jurist, liberal politician, and novelist: in the judicial service of Prussia. He was tried for high treason in 1849, and was acquitted but was dismissed from the service. He wrote criminal novels.

Temminck (tem'mink), Coenraad Jacob. Born about 1778: died in 1858. A Dutch naturalist, noted as an ornithologist.

Temora (te-mō'rā). One of the poems of Ossian, published in 1763. See Ossian.

Tempe (tem'pē), Vale of. [Gr. Τέμπη, contracted from Τέμενεα.] A valley in eastern Thessaly, Greece, deeply cleft between Olympus on the north and Ossa on the south, and traversed by the Peneius. It has been celebrated from ancient times for its beauty; but "the scenery is distinguished rather by savage grandeur than by the sylvan beauty which Ælian and others attribute to it." Length, about 6 miles.

Tempel (tem'pel), Ernst Wilhelm Leberecht. Born at Nieder-Kunersdorf, Lusatia, Dec. 4, 1821: died at Arcetri, Italy, March 16, 1889. A German astronomer, director of the observatory at Arcetri, near Florence. He discovered several asteroids, comets, etc.

Tempest (tem'pest), The. A play by Shakspere, first performed at court in 1611, first printed in the folio of 1623. The subject was taken from a pamphlet "A Discovery of the Bermudas, otherwise called the Isle of Devils," by "one Jourdan, who probably returned from Virginia" (1610). Hazy thinks it was probably abridged by Beaumont about 1613, and the mask inserted. In 1667 Dryden and Davenant produced "The Tempest, or the Enchanted Island" (printed in 1670), a version intended to improve Shakspere's play: the mutilations, or rather additions, are now said by a German scholar to be wholesale conveyances from a play of Calderon. (Furness.)

In 1673 Shadwell turned "The Tempest" into an opera, and in 1756 Garrick produced a opera with the same idea based on Shakspere and Dryden; he repudiated the authorship. Sir Arthur Sullivan has written "The Music to Shakspere's Tempest," in twelve numbers; this was first performed in 1862.

Templars (tem'plarz). A military order, also called Knights Templars or Knights of the Temple, from the early headquarters of the order in the Crusaders' palace at Jerusalem (the so-called temple of Solomon). The order was founded at Jerusalem about 1118, and was confirmed by the Pope in 1128. Its special aim was protection to pilgrims on the way to the holy shrines, and the distinguishing garb of the knights was a white mantle with a red cross. The order took a leading part in the conduct of the Crusades, and spread rapidly, acquiring great wealth and influence in Spain, France, England, and other countries in Europe. Its chief seats in the East were Jerusalem, Acre, and Cyprus, and in Europe a foundation called the Temple, then just outside Paris. The members comprised knights, men-at-arms, and chaplains; they were grouped in commanderies, with a preceptor at the head of each province, and a grand master at the head of the order. The Templar-were accused of heresy, immorality, and other offenses by Philip IV. of France in 1307, and the order was suppressed by the Council of Vienne in 1312.

Temple (tem'pl). The. The religious edifice of the Jews in Jerusalem. There were three buildings successively erected in this city, and styled, and still known by the names of their builder, the temple of Solomon, the temple of Zerubbabel, and the temple of Herod. The first was built by Solomon, and was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about 586 B. C. The second was built by the Jews on their return from the captivity (about 537 B. C.), and was pillaged or partly destroyed several times, especially by Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, and Herod. The third, the largest and most magnificent of the three, was begun by Herod the Great, and was completely destroyed at the capture of Jerusalem by Titus (A. D. 70). Numerous attempts have been made toward the restoration of the first and the third of these temples, but scholars are not agreed in respect to architectural details. The ornament and design were in any case of severe and simple character, though rich materials were used. The successive temples all consisted of a combination of buildings, compicuous by being separated from each other above one other, and provided also with chambers for the use of the priests and for educational purposes. The inclosure of Herod's temple covered 19 acres. It comprised an outer court of the Gentiles, a court of the women, a court of Israel, a court of the priests, and the temple building with the holy place, and, within all (entered only once a year, and only by the high priest), the holy of holies. Within the court of the priests were the great altar and the laver; within the holy place, the golden candlestick, the altar of incense, and the table for the shewbread; and within the holy of holies, the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat.

Temple, The. A lodge in London of the religious and military establishment of the middle ages known as the Knights Templars. The Temple Church, London, is the only part of it now existing. The first settlement of the Knights Templars of the Holy Sepulchre in London was in Holborn, where in 1118 they built a house which must have stood near the northeast corner of Chancery Lane. They removed to the New Temple in the Strand in 1184. When the order was suppressed in the reign of Edward II., their house was given by the king to the Earl of Pembroke; it went next to the Earl of Lancaster, and at his death reverted to the crown. In 1338 it went to the Knights Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, at Clerkenwell, who leased part of it in 1346 to students of the common law, and the site of the Outer Temple the two Inns of Court called the Middle Temple and Inner Temple now stand; they have ever since been occupied by barristers, and are the joint property of the Societies of the Inner and of the Middle Temple, which have the right of calling candidates to the degree of barrister. The Inner Temple is so called because it is within the precincts of the Old Middle Temple; between it was between the Inner and Outer Temple. The Outer Temple remained in the possession of the Bishop of Exeter which it furnished was leased, and was afterward converted into the Exeter Building.

Temple, The. A volume of "Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations," by George Herbert, published in 1633, after his death.

Temple (tonpl), Le. A fortified lodge of the Knights Templars established in Paris by the Count of Troyes in 1136, the standing where the Marché du Temple now stands. After the abolition of the order in 1312, the old building was used for various purposes. The chapel (similar in general plan to that in London), stood until 1808, and the great square tower, made memorable by the imprisonment of Louis XVI. in 1792-93, was destroyed in 1810.

Temple (tem'pl), Frederick. Born Nov 30, 1821. Bishop of London. He graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1842, and was headmaster of Rugby 1858-69. In 1860 he became prominent as the author of the first of the "Essays and Reviews." In 1868-70 he advocated the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He was appointed bishop of Exeter in 1869, and bishop of London in 1885. He was Bampton lecturer at Oxford in 1884. He has published "Sermons Preached in Rugby Chapel" (1941).

Temple, Henry John, Viscount Palmerston. Born at Broadlands, near Romsey, Hampshire, Oct. 20, 1784; died at Brocket Hall, near Hatfield, Hertfordshire, Oct. 18, 1865. A British statesman. He belonged to the Irish branch of the Temple family. On April 17, 1809, he succeeded to his father's title. He was educated at Harrow. He became member of Parliament for Newtown, Isle of Wight, in 1807, and junior lord of the admiralty in the Duke of Portland's administration in the same year. From 1809 to 1828 he was secretary of war. At this time he was a Tory, a disciple of Pitt, and an advocate of Catholic emancipation. In 1830 he entered the Whig ministry of Lord Grey as minister of foreign affairs. His activity in this position was very great. He was interested in the policy which established Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg on the throne of Belgium, and in the maintenance of the Ottoman empire as a defense against Russia on the Bosporus and France on the Nile. At the close of the Melbourne administration in 1840, Palmerston went out of office for 5 years. In 1848, in the ministry of Lord John Russell, he was involved with the revolutionary party in Europe, and ardently supported the Italian revolution. In 1851 he openly approved the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, and was dismissed from the foreign office. He was secretary of state for the home office under the Earl of Aberdeen in 1855. On Feb. 5, 1855, he became prime minister, and retained the office with the interval of Lord Derby's administration in 1858-59 until his death.

Temple, Sir William. Born at London, 1628; died at Moor Park, Surrey, Jan. 27, 1699. An English diplomatist, statesman, and author. He was educated at Cambridge, entered Parliament in 1665; concluded a treaty with the Bishop of Munster in 1665; became ambassador at Brussels in 1666; negotiated the treaty of the Triple Alliance in 1668; was ambassador at The Hague 1668-71; negotiated a peace with the Netherlands in 1674; was ambassador to the Congress of Nimeguen; formed a plan for a ministry consisting of himself and one of its chief members; and withdrew from public life in 1681. He wrote "An Essay on the Present State and Settlement of Ireland" (1668), "The Present State of the United Provinces of the Netherlands" (1672), "Observations upon the United Provinces" (1673), "Essay upon Government" (1672), "Trade in Ireland" (1674), "Miscellanea" (1680), "Poems" (1692), "Memoirs" (1691 and 1699), and "Introduction to the History of England" (1695).

Temple Bar. A famous gateway before the Temple in London, which formerly divided Fleet street from the Strand. It was built in ancient custom, when the sovereign visited the City, he asked permission of the lord mayor to pass it. In its last form it was a rather ugly archway built by Sir Wren in 1670. It spanned the street with an elliptical arch flanked by two small arches over the footways, and had a second story in which were four niches with statues of sovereigns, and a carved pediment. It was removed in 1878, and was erected at Waltham Cross, Herts. It is now represented by a monument called the Temple Bar Memorial, a tall pedestal with statues of Queen Victoria and the Prince of Wales in niches at the sides, surmounted by the griffin and arms of the city of London.

Temple Beau, The. A comedy by Henry Fielding, produced in 1730.

Temple Church. A church within the bounds of the Inner Temple in London. It consists of the Round Church and the Choir. The former is in a rich Norman style; it is 58 feet in diameter, and was finished in 1185. The choir is Early English. The Round Church contains several beautiful altar-tombs of Templars.

Temple Gardens. Gardens belonging to the Temple, London, separated from the Thames by the Victoria Embankment. According to Shakspere, the red and white roses which were assumed as badges of the houses of Lancaster and York were plucked in this garden by Plantagenet and Somerset at the end of the brawl which began the civil war.

Temple Grief, A. See Grief, A.

Temple of Fame, The. A poem by Alexander Pope, published in 1715. It differs from Chaucer's "House of Fame," though imitating it.

Temple of Glass, The. A poem by Lydgate, partly imitated from Chaucer's "House of Fame."

Temple of Heaven or of the Great Dragon. A temple at Peking, perhaps the most notable of Chinese temples. It stands in an inclosure about a square mile, known as the Altar Area, and the temple, which is surrounded by subordinate buildings. The temple proper stands on a 3-staged terrace ascended by lofty flights of steps. The uppermost stage is crowned with a widely projecting roof, that of the highest stage forming a concave cone of blue tiles terminating in a gilded wood finial. The date assigned is 1420.

Temple of Mexico. See Teocalli.

Temple of the Cross. A name commonly given to one of the ruined edifices at Palenque, Mexico. In a small inner room of this building there is a structure resembling an altar; and above this altar formerly stood the cross sculptured in bas-relief from which the temple derives its name. This consisted of a sculptured slabs joined together, showing a central cross-like symbol, and on each side figures of priests or worshipers, hieroglyphics. The middle slab, containing the cross as now in the museum at Mexico; one of the others is at Washington, where it is known as the Palenque tablet; the third is still at Palenque. The meaning of the cross has been a subject for much conjecture and dispute: it was probably a symbol of the fertilizing powers of nature. Another sculpture from the same building is supposed to represent the Maya rain-god. The temple itself is a quadrilateral, and rests on a truncated pyramid. See Palenque Tablet.

Temple of the Sun (at Cuzco). See Curicancha.

Temptation of St. Anthony. 1. A painting by Pieter Brueghel the younger (1604), in the museum at Dresden. The saint is praying in a cave partly roofed with old planks, and undergoes temptation from a young woman richly dressed and attended by fantastic demons. The architecture and scenery of the background present a free rendering of Tivoli.

2. A painting by Tintoretto, in San Trovaso at Venice. The saint sits calmly, with four tempters about him, one a demon, and two women, young and beautiful.

Ten, Council of. In the ancient republic of Venice, a secret tribunal instituted in 1310 and continued down to the overthrow of the republic in 1797. It was composed at first of ten and later of 17 members, and exercised unlimited power in the suppression of internal and external affairs, often with great rigor and oppressions.

He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; traveled in Greece, where he met Lord Byron; and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1831. He married a daughter of William Tennent of Belfast, and adopted her name. He was returned as member of Parliament for Belfast in 1832, and was colonial secretary at Ceylon 1845–50, and permanent secretary of the board of trade 1850–67. He published a "Picture of Greece" (1826), "Letters from the Ægean" (1829), "History of Modern Times" (1830), "Belgium" (1831), "Christianity in Ceylon" (1850), "Ceylon, Physical, Historical, and Topographical" (1859), "Natural History of Ceylon" (1861).

Tennes (ten'ēz). King of Sidon (Phenicia). He betrayed his city and people to Artaxerxes III. Ochus, king of Persia, in order to purchase his own life. About 40,000 inhabitants of Sidon killed themselves on this occasion, the city was destroyed by Ochus, and even Tennes himself was executed.

Tennessee (ten-e-sē'). The principal tributary of the Ohio River. It is formed by the union at Kingston, East Tennessee, of the Tinch and Holston (which rise in Virginia), and flows southwestward to Tennessee past Knoxville, Chattanooga, and Decatur, Alabama, to the northeast corner of Mississippi, and then north through Tennessee and Kentucky, to join the Ohio at Paducah, Kentucky. Total length, including the Holston, 1,040 miles; navigable nearly the greater part of its course. The chief obstruction is at the Muscle Shoals in Alabama.

Tennessee. One of the South Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Nashville; chief cities, Memphis and Chattanooga. It is bounded by Kentucky and Virginia on the north; North Carolina on the southeast; Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi on the south; and Arkansas and Missouri (separated by the Mississippi River) on the west. It is mountainous in the east containing the Alleghanies and the Cumberland plateau, and is lower in the center and west. The leading natural products are Indian corn, cotton, and tobacco. The manufactures (iron, cotton, etc.) are increasing. The State has 96 counties, sends 2 senators and 10 representatives to Congress, and has 12 electoral votes. This region was claimed in early times by North Carolina, and by the French and Spaniards. The leading settlement was made from Virginia and North Carolina in 1769. The temporary State of Franklin was formed in 1784. North Carolina ceded its claims to the United States, and the Territory of Tennessee was formed in 1790. It was admitted to the Union in 1796. It seceded May 6 1861, and was the scene of many important events in the Civil War, including the battles of Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Island No. 10, Memphis, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, Knoxville, and the battles of Franklin and Nashville. It was readmitted in 1866. Area, 42,050 square miles. Population (1880), 1,707,518.

Tennyson (ten'i-son), Alfred, first Lord Tennyson. Born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, Aug. 6, 1809; died at Aldworth House, near Haslemere, Surrey, Oct. 6, 1892. A celebrated English poet. He was the son of George Clayton Tennyson, vicar of Great Grimsby and rector of Somersby and Enderby. He published with his brother Charles a collection of juvenile poems ("Poems by Two Brothers") in 1827; was a student at Trinity College, Cambridge 1827–31 (with Arthur Hallam, Houghton, Trench, and others), where he wrote the prize poem "Timbuctoo" (1829); lived at or near London till 1850, when he married and settled at Twickenham; and afterward lived at Aldworth (Surrey), and from 1853 at Farringford (Isle of Wight). He received a state pension in 1845, succeeded Wordsworth as poet laureate in 1850, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Tennyson of Aldworth and Farringford in 1884. He lived a secluded life, and died of old age after a short and painless illness. He was buried in the Poets' Corner, near Chaucer, in Westminster Abbey. He wrote "Poems, Chiefly Lyrical" (1830; including "Mariana," "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," "The Ballad of Oriana," etc.); "Poems" (1832; including "The Lady of Shalott," "The Miller's Daughter," "Œnone," "The Palace of Art," "The May Queen," "The Lotos Eaters," and "A Dream of Fair Women"); "Poems" (1842; including "Ulysses," "Two Voices," "The Talking Oak," "Morte d'Arthur," "The Gardener's Daughter," and "Locksley Hall"), "The Princess: a medley" (1847), "In Memoriam" (1850), "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" (1852), "Charge of the Light Brigade," "Maud" and other poems (1855), "Idylls of the King" (1859–85), "A Welcome to the Princess Alexandra" (1863), "Enoch Arden and other Poems" (1864), "The Golden Supper" (1869), "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," with music by Sir Arthur Sullivan (1870), "Queen Mary" (a drama, 1875), "Harold" (a drama, 1877), "The Falcon" (a short play, acted 1881, published 1884), "The Cup" (a short play, acted 1881, published 1884), "The Promise of May" (acted 1882, published 1886), "Becket" (a drama, 1884), "The Lover's Tale" (1879: including ants fourth part "The Golden Supper"), "Ballads and other Poems" (1880), "Tiresias and other Poems" (1885), partly new, and "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After" (1886), "Demeter and Other Poems" (1890), "The Death of Œnone, Akbar's Dream, and Other Poems" (1892), "The Foresters: Robin Hood and Maid Marian" (a drama, 1892).

He published a volume of poems entitled "Days and Hours" (1854), "Isles of Greece" (1890), "Daphne and Other Poems" (1891).

Tenochtitlan (tēn-och-tēt-län'). [Derivation doubtful.] The chief city of the Aztecs, occupying the site of the modern city of Mexico. It was founded about 1325 on what was then an island in Tezcuco Lake. Causeways were built to the adjacent mainland, and these appear to have been the only approaches. Most of the streets were occupied by canals, and the houses were subject to frequent inundations. Water was supplied from Chapultepec by an aqueduct. The most remarkable building was the great teocalli or temple; most of the other edifices were low, and probably were built of adobe. The Spaniards under Cortes entered peaceably, but were subsequently driven out, and only returned after a long siege, during the course of which a great part of the city was destroyed. (See Cortes.) The new capital, which was built on its site, was commonly and officially called Tenochtitlan conjointly with Tezcotitlan, Tenoxtitan, etc.) for many years after the conquest. Mexico (Aztec Mexitli) was also a name of the ancient city. Also written Temixtitan, Nuestra Señora, from one of the appellations of the war-god Huitzilopochtli.

Tenos (tē'nos), or Tinos (tē'nos), or Tino (tē'nō). [Gr. Τῆνος.] An island of the Cyclades, belonging to Greece, southeast of Andros and northeast of Syra; one of the most prosperous of the Greek islands. It exports wine and marble, and employs into Mobile Bay.

Teocalli (tā-ō-kal'yē). [Nahuatl, 'house of the god.'] A general name applied to any pyramidal temple in ancient Mexico; in particular, the great temple in Tenochtitlan or Mexico City. It was completed about 1486 by Ahuitzotl. According to the accounts which have come down to us, it was an artificial truncated pyramid, faced with stone, about 375 feet long by 300 feet broad at the base, and 225 by 250 feet at the top, which was 97 feet above the ground. In ascending to the summit it was necessary to pass five times around it, on a series of terraces; this arrangement was well adapted to exhibit processions as well as for defense. On the flat surface were several small buildings, with the images of Huitzilopochtli and other gods and the sacrificial stone. The pyramid was surrounded by a stone wall nearly 5,000 feet in circumference, and probably inclosing other but smaller temples. The great teocalli was the scene of several fierce battles between the Spaniards and Indians in 1520–21. After the city was taken, the pyramid was torn down, and a part of its site is now occupied by the cathedral. Some of the sculptured stones and idols which were on or near it are now in the Mexican national museum. See Huitzilopochtli, Teopanxiqui, and Sacrificial Stone.

Teos (tē'os). [Gr. Τέως.] In ancient geography, an Ionian city of Asia Minor, situated on the western coast 25 miles southwest of Smyrna. Its ruins contain a noted temple of Bacchus, a beautiful Ionic hexastyle peripteros on a stylobate of 3 steps. It stood in a court surrounded by stoas. The fine sculptured frieze is in the museum at Constinople.

Teotihuacan, or San Juan Teotihuacan (sän hōän tä-ō-tē-wä-kän'). A town of the republic and state of Mexico, 27 miles northeast of Mexico City. In the vicinity are many remarkable ruins, including two very large and many small pyramids, a walled inclosure called the "citadel," etc. Tradition assigns these remains to the Toltecs (which see), and they are certainly older than the Aztec period. Population of the modern town, about 5,000.

Teoyaomiqui (tā-ō-yo-mē'kē), The name given to a stone idol which was dug up near the ancient teocalli at Mexico, and is now in the Mexican national museum. Leon y Gama, who first described it under this name, states that Teoyaomiqui was the wife or female companion of the god Huitzilopochtli; others suppose that the statue is compound, representing several gods. It is doubtful if Teoyaomiqui was really a personage in the Nahuatl mythology; and the best modern investigators are inclined to believe that this hideous stone was the war-god himself. It is about 8½ feet high and 5½ feet wide. See Huitzilopochtli.

It is covered with carvings almost to overloading. . . . The general effect, however, is pleasing, and the stone presents a most hideous agglomeration of repulsive forms. . . . In place of christening the monolith after an imaginary impossibility of those ancient Mexican characteristics make no mention, it strikes me as much more natural to believe that it represents the well-known war-god of the Mexican tribe, Huitzilopochtli; and that consequently it was indeed the famous principal idol of aboriginal Mexico, or Tenochtitlan.

Bandelier, Report of an Archæological Tour in Mexico, 1881, p. 67.

Tepaneca (tā-pā-nāks'), or Tecpanecs (tāk-pā-nāks'). A Nahuatl tribe of the Mexican valley. They were originally a branch of the Tezcucans who settled at Azcapozalco, on the western shore of Lake Tezcuco, about 1168. In the 14th century the Aztecs of Tenochtitlan paid tribute to them. About 1430 the Aztecs conquered them, destroyed their capital at Azcapozalco, and established a slave-market on its site. The Tepanecs were allowed to form a new capital a little to the south of the old one, at Tlacopan (now Tacuba). They joined with Tenochtitlan and Tezcuco in the confederacy formed soon after, but never rose to preëminence. The last king joined to Tenochtitlan by a causeway over which Cortés retreated on the Noche Triste.

Tepeguana. See Tepehuan.

Tepehuan (tā-pā-he-wän'). A tribe of North American Indians which inhabit mainly the eastern slope of the Sierra Madre, from lat. 25° to 26° N., in the state of Durango, Mexico. Their domain formerly extended across the borders into Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Jalisco, Zacatecas, and Coahuila. Their tribal name is adopted from a term signifying 'conquerer.' Number, less than 1,000. See Piman.

Tepic (tā-pēk'). 1. A territory of Mexico, on the Pacific coast north of the state of Jalisco, to which it was formerly attached. Area, 11,581 square miles. Population (1894), 134,120 (mostly semi-civilized Indians).—2. The capital of the territory, 18 miles from the Bay of San Blas. Population, about 14,000.

Teplitz (tep'litz), or Töplitz (tėp'litz). A town and watering-place in northern Bohemia, situated in the valley of the Biela, near the mountains, 46 miles northwest of Prague. It is one of the most frequented watering-places in Europe (alkaline springs), and has been the scene of several conferences of princes. Population (1891), commune, 17,526.

Ter (ter). A river in northeastern Spain, flowing into the Mediterranean east of Gerona. Length, about 85 miles.

Terah (tē'rä). The father of Abraham (Gen. xi.). The name is etymologically connected by some with the Assyrian turahu, antelope.

Teramo (tä'rä-mō), formerly Abruzzo Ulteriore I. A province in central Italy, in the compartimento of the Abruzzi and Molise. Area, 1,067 square miles. Population (1891), 264,088.

Teramo. The capital of the province of Teramo, Italy, situated at the junction of the Vezzola with the Tordino, in lat. 42° 40′ N., long. 13° 45′ E.: the ancient Interamnium, and the medieval Aprutium (also Interampne, Teramne, Terame).

It has a cathedral and Roman antiquities. Population (1892), 21,000.

Terburg (ter'bŏrĥ) (originally Ter Borch), Gerard. Born at Zwolle, Netherlands, about 1608; died at Deventer, Netherlands, 1681. A Dutch genre- and portrait-painter, noted particularly for his draperies.

Terceira (ter-sā'rā). One of the principal islands of the Azores, situated northwest of St. Michael. It contains Angra, the capital of the group. A regency in behalf of Queen Maria was established here in 1829 by Villaflor with Palmella and Guerreira. Length, about 28 miles. Population, about 45,000–50,000.

In Dec., 1828, an expedition, consisting of 662 Portuguese refugees of the party of the queen, sailed from England for Terceira in four vessels, under the command of Count Saldanha. Terceira held for the queen, and arms and ammunition had previously been sent them from England. The British government ordered Captain Walpole, of the "Ranger," to stop this expedition off Terceira, which he did by firing a gun into Saldanha's ship. The ground taken by the Duke of Wellington in defence of this measure was his resolution to maintain the neutrality of England between the two parties then contending for the crown of Portugal; but the proceeding was vehemently attacked in Parliament and elsewhere.

Greville, Memoirs (editor's note), I. 169.

Terceira, Duke of (Antonio José de Souza, Count of Villaflor). Born at Lisbon, March 10, 1792; died there, April 27, 1860. A Portuguese general and politician. He went to Terceira in 1828, and took part in the political events there; conquered the Azores in 1831 in behalf of Maria da Gloria; landed at Oporto May 26, 1832; and defeated the Miguelists several times in 1833 and 1834. Termagaunt (ter'ma-gant). A name given to the god of the Saracens in the medieval romances, in which he is constantly linked with Mahound. In "Orlando Furioso" he is called Trevigant. The French romancers called it Tervagaunte. The origin of the term is unknown. It is possible that the latter part of the word, -magaunt, may conceal the name Mahomid, or Mahomet: if so, it is simply an invocation of the prophet. The word is sometimes used as meaning "a scolding woman."

Terminalia (tėr-mi-nā'li-ă). In Roman antiquity, a festival celebrated annually in honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was held on the 23d of February. Its essential feature being a survey or perambulation of boundaries.

Teror (ta-ror'). A small town in the island of Gran Canaria, Canary Islands.

Terpander (tėr-pan'dėr). [Gr. Τέρπανδρος.] Born at Antissa, Lesbos: lived in the first half of the 7th century B. C. A famous Lesbian musician and lyric poet, settled in Sparta: called "the father of Greek music," perhaps from his development of the lyre.

We know nothing of Terpander's youth, save that he was born in Lesbos, the real home of song and music, and that, or was called to Sparta, where he established the musical contests at the Karnean festival about 670 B. C. (Ol. 26). He was said to have been victor at the Pythian contests for four consecutive eighty-year heats, which brings down his activity at least to the year 640 B. C. Thus we may imagine him the older contemporary of Tyrtæus. Not merely lines of his hymns remain — solemn fragments in hexameters or heavy spondaic meters, which show that hymns to the gods (nomoi) were his chief productions. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 167.

Terpsichore (tėrp-sik'ō-rē). [Gr. Τερψιχόρη, delighting in the dance.] In classical mythology, one of the Muses, the patroness of the choral dance and of the dramatic chorus developed from it. In the last days of the Greek religion her attributions became restricted chiefly to the province of lyric poetry. In art this Muse is represented as a graceful figure, often being drapery, often seated, and usually bearing a lyre. Her type is closely akin to that of Erato, but the latter is always shown standing.

It is known in different parts as the Lippischer Wald, Osning, etc. The Lippe, Ems, and Werre have their rise here. A victory was gained in this range (exact locality undetermined) in 9 A. C. by the Germans under Arminius (Hermann) over the Romans under Varus, the Roman army being nearly destroyed. Length, about 50 miles.

Teutones (tu'tō-nēz), or Teutoni (tū'tō-nī). In ancient history, a Germanic people who, with the Cimbri, defeated several Roman armies at the end of the 2d century B. C., and were nearly destroyed by Marius at Aquæ Sextiæ, 102 B. C. They are mentioned later as dwelling near the lower Elbe and eastward.

We have a Teutonic parallel of the same etymological origin in the Gothic "thiudans," . . . Norse "thjodann," "a king," and A.-Saxon "theoden," which also meant a king or lord: both the Norse and the A.-Saxon words are found only in poetry, which is an indication that they are very ancient formations, going back probably far behind the time of Ulfilas, as may be shown by approaching the question from another direction: the word touta and its congeners entered into many proper names, and when the Romans had to write these names they represented the Teutonic dental, as they did the Gaulish one, as a simple t: witness Cæsar's Teutones, Ammianus Marcellinus Tentomeres, Eutropius' Teutobodius, and Florus' Teutobochus. Now in Teutones or Teutoni we have the plural, as given by Roman authors, of the word "thiudans," "thjodann," and "theoden"; and that a people should have given themselves such a name as Teutones, meaning kings, will surprise no one who has noticed such Celtic names as that of the Boii, which likewise denoted princes, those of the Caturiges and Catuvellauni, meaning war-kings or battle-princes; and that of the Baturiges, which actually meant Weltherrscher, or lord of the world. This explanation of the origin of the modern term Teutonic is doubtless open to the objection of implying that a natural inclination to brag was not quite confined to the Celt.

Texas (tek'sas). One of the South Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Austin; chief seaport, Galveston. It is bounded by Oklahoma on the north, Indian Territory and Arkansas on the northeast (separated by the Red River), Louisiana and the Gulf of Mexico on the east, Gulf of Mexico on the south, Mexico (separated by the Rio Grande) on the southwest, and New Mexico on the west. It is the largest State in the Union, comprises a low coast region, a prairie country, a central hilly region, high plains to the north and west (including the Staked Plain), and a mountainous region west of the Pecos. Principal rivers are the Canadian, Red River, Sabine, Trinity, Brazos, Colorado, Nueces, and Rio Grande. It is an important agricultural State, the leading products being cotton, Indian corn, live stock, sugar, and rice. It has 263 counties, sends seven Senators and 13 representatives to Congress, and has 15 electoral votes. An attempt at settlement was made by La Salle about 1685, and various missions were established by the Spanish in the 18th century. The region was invaded by various adventurers early in the 19th century. It formed with Coahuila a state of Mexico, and revolted rapidly about 1826–30 by American colonists. A rebellion against Mexico broke out in 1835; the garrisons at the Alamo and Goliad were massacred by the Mexicans in 1836; and the Mexicans were finally defeated and Houston at San Jacinto, April 21, 1836. Texas was a republic from 1836 to 1845, when it was annexed to the United States. It was the scene of early events in the Mexican war (in the years 1845–48); was the scene of many of various events in the Rebellion, and of the last conflicts; and was readmitted in 1870. Area, 265,780 square miles. Population (1890), 2,235,523.

Tezcatlipoca (täth-kät-lē-pō'kä). In Aztec (Mexican) mythology, one of the supreme gods, the soul of the world and its creator, supposed to be endowed with perpetual youth. On the teocalli at Mexico he had a chapel near that of Huitzilopochli. Occasionally human victims were made to him. The victim (said by some to represent the god himself) was selected a year before, and was a young man of perfect form. He was kept under kind of bridge for the ceremony, but was allowed every pleasure; beautiful girls were given him for companions; and at feasts he was honored as a divinity. On the day of the sacrifice he was stripped of his gaudy clothes, and while ascending to the temple threw away his chaplets of flowers and broke his musical instruments.

Tezcotzinco (täs-kōt-sēn'kō). A hill about 5 miles east of the town of Tezcuco, Mexico. It was a garden or park and country residence of the ancient chiefs of Tezcuco. Ixtlilxochitl describes it as a place of wonderful beauty, adorned with fountains, baths, and palaces: but this description is probably exaggerated. It is said to have been a favorite retreat of Netzahualcoyotl (which see). The place is marked by a few ruins overgrown with vegetation. Some small artificial pools are erroneously called the Baths of Montezuma.

Tezcucans (täs-kō'kans), or Texcocans (täs-kō'kans), or Acolhuans (ä-kōl'ō-ans). An ancient Nahuatl tribe of the valley of Mexico. Some traditions make them the offspring of the semi-mythical race called Chichimecs. About 1120 they settled at Tenayucan or Tezcuco, then on the eastern shore of the lake, and this soon became the most powerful pueblo of the valley. Early in the 15th century they were, for a time, conquered by the Tepanecs; subsequently they joined in a league with Tenochtithan and Tlacopan, and eventually became subordinate in power to the former pueblo. Their last chief or "king," Ixtlilxochitl, joined Cortés in 1520, and assisted in the siege of Tenochtithan or Mexico. The Tezcucan historians claim for their nation a preeminence in civilization among the Nahuatl tribes.

Tezcuco (tas-kō'kō), or Texcoco (täs-kō'kō). A town of the state and republic of Mexico, near the eastern shore of Tezcuco Lake, opposite to and 17 miles from Mexico City. It was the ancient capital of the Tezcucans or Acolhuans, who called it Acolhuacan or Tenayucan. (See Tezcucans and Xolotl.) At this place, in 1520, Cortés organized the siege of Mexico and built the brigantines with which he assaulted that city from the lake. Population (1880), with the commune, 15,865.

Tezcoco, or Texcoco, Lake of. The largest of the cluster of lakes in the valley of Mexico. At present it is nearly oval in outline, about 12 miles long, 7 wide, and less than 2 feet deep. Mexico City is about 4 miles from the western shore, and Tezcoco is about the same distance from the eastern side. Low and more or less swampy lands around it mark its ancient limits, which were at least four times as great as at present; Mexico was then on an island in it, approached by causeways, and Tezcoco, Tlacopan, and other towns were on its shore. The water was deep enough in 1520 to float the ships of Cortés. During the Aztec and early colonial periods it was frequently swelled by rains causing disastrous floods in Mexico; one of these floods lasted 3 years (1629–32). The subsequent inclosing, filling in with sediment, drainage, and evaporation. Until 1856 the drains of Mexico opened into the lake, and its polluted waters, forced back through them during the rains, caused great mortality in the city. This has been remedied by extensive drainage works, and it is now proposed to empty the lake entirely. Tezcoco is the lowest of the valley lakes, and its waters are brackish. It has no fish, but the singular amphibian called the axolotl is abundant.

Tezel. See Tetzel.

Thacher (thach'ẽr), George. Born at Yarmouth, Maine, April 12, 1754; died at Biddeford, Maine, April 6, 1848. An American jurist and politician. He was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Continental Congress; was member of Congress from the Maine district of Massachusetts 1789–1801; and was judge of the supreme Court of Massachusetts and of Maine.

Thacher, Thomas Anthony. Born at Hartford, Conn., Jan. 11, 1815; died at New Haven, Conn., April 7, 1886. An American classical scholar, professor of Latin at Yale from 1842. He translated Madvig's Latin grammar, and edited various Latin works.

Thackeray (thak'e-ri), William Makepeace. Born at Calcutta, July 18, 1811; died at London, Dec. 24, 1863. A celebrated English novelist, satirist, and critic. He went to England when about 5 years old, and was educated at the Charterhouse school and at Trinity College, Cambridge, leaving in 1830. He traveled on the Continent (visiting Weimar, etc.) for several years. In 1833 he began to devote himself seriously to literature and art, wrote for the "National Standard (of which he was afterward both editor and proprietor), and later for "Fraser's Magazine," "The Times," "Ainsworth's Magazine" (to which he long contributed as Michael Angelo Titmarsh), for "Punch," etc. He had a talent for drawing and caricature, and about 1834 went to Paris, with the idea of becoming a painter. In this he was unsuccessful; but he illustrated many of his own works, and about 1838 made his well-known application to illustrate "Pickwick." After having married Miss Isabella Shaw, he returned to England. About 1840 his wife's mind became affected, after the birth of her third daughter, and she never recovered, though she lived on until nearly two years after her husband's death. He visited the East in 1844, lectured in the United States in 1852–53 and 1854–55, and was editor of the "Cornhill Magazine" 1860–62. His chief novels are "Vanity Fair" (1847–48), which made his reputation), "Pendennis" (1848–50), "Henry Esmond" (1852), "The Newcomes" (1853–54), and "The Virginians" (1857–59), following his other novels and stories are "The Adventures of Philip" (1861–62), "Lovel the Widower" (1860), "Adventures of Philip" (1861–62), "The Rose and the Ring," and "Denis Duval" (unfinished). Many of these appeared first in "Fraser's," "Cornhill," and other periodicals. His other works include "English Humorists of the 18th Century" (first delivered as lectures in 1851), "The Four Georges" (lectures delivered in the United States in 1855, first printed in 1860), "The Roundabout Papers" (1862), "Early and Late Papers," (edited by J. T. Fields, 1867), "The Orphan of Pimlico, etc." (edited 1875), ballads, etc.

Thaddæus (thad-dē'us). [Gr. Θαδδαῖος.] One of the apostles, otherwise called Jude or Judas and Lebbæus. See Jude.

Thale (tā'le). A watering-place in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated in the Harz, on the Bode, 5 miles west of Quedlinburg. Population (1890), 6,292.

Thales (thā'lēz). [Gr. Θαλῆς.] Born at Miletus, Asia Minor, about 640 B. C.: died about 546. A famous Greek philosopher, astronomer, and geometer: one of the seven wise men of Greece, and the earliest of the Ionian natural philosophers. He regarded water as the principle of all things. He predicted an eclipse of the sun for May 28, 585 B. C.; and to him were attributed various discoveries in geometry and astronomy.

Volney considered the eclipse of Thales to have taken place B. C. 625 ('Recherches etc.,' vol. i. p. 342). Clinton places it B. C. 603 (F. H. vol. i. p. 170). Ideler considers that no eclipse about this period fulfils the necessary conditions except that of B. C. 580 ('Handbuch der Chronologie,' vol. i. p. 209). Mr. Bind and Professor Airy have recently suggested the late date of B. C. 580 (Bosanquet, 'Tail of Nineveh,' p. 14). Encyclopædia Britannica, I. 359, note.

Thales, or Thaletas (thā-lē'tās). [Gr. Θαλῆς, Θαλήτας.] Born in Crete: lived about the 7th century B. C. A lyric poet and musician of Sparta.

Thalia (thā-lī'a). [Gr. Θάλεια, Θαλία.] 1. In Greek mythology, the joyful Muse, to whom is due the bloom of life, she inspired gaiety; was the patroness of the theater, accompanied by satyrs and nymphs, and also favored rural pursuits and pleasures. At a later period she became the Muse of comedy, and to the Romans was little known as any other character. In the later art she is generally represented with a comic mask, a shepherd's crook, and a wreath of ivy.

2. An asteroid (No. 23) discovered at London by Hind, June 15, 1852.

Thalia (thal'ō). [Gr. Θαλώ.] In Greek mythology, one of the Horæ.

Thame (tām). A river in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, England, which joins the Thames (of which it is the principal tributary) at Dorchester. Length, about 35 miles.

Thame. A town in Oxfordshire, England, situated on the Thame 13 miles east of Oxford. Population (1891), 5,353.

Thames (temz). [Early mod. E. also Thamys, Temes, Temse, ME. Temse, AS. Tames, Temese, Tamese, L. Tamesis (Cæsar), Tamesa (Tacitus), Gr. Ταμεσᾶς or Ταμέσας (Dion Cassius), and said to be Celtic, meaning 'broad water.' The F. Tamise is from the L. G. Thomse from the E.] The principal river in Great Britain. It rises near Cirencester, Gloucestershire, where the Churn and Wiltshire separates Oxford and Buckingham from Berkshire, Middlesex from Surrey, and Essex from Kent; and, broadening into an estuary, flows into the North Sea. Its course is generally easterly. Its junction with the Thame is called also the Isis. The principal tributaries are the Cherwell, Thame, Colne, Lea, and Roding on the north, and the Kennet, Wey, and Mole on the south. The principal places on its banks are Oxford, Reading, Windsor, Eton, Kingston, Richmond, Brentford, London, Woolwich, Gravesend, and Sheerness. Length to Sheerness, 208 miles. Width at London Bridge, 900 feet; at Gravesend, half a mile. It is tidal to Teddington, and is navigable by locks for barges from Lechlade; for large vessels, from the Pool, London.

Thames, A river in Ontario, Canada, which flows into Lake St. Clair 32 miles east of Detroit. Near its banks, Oct. 5, 1813, the Americans under Harrison (cavalry under R. M. Johnson) defeated the allied British under Procter) and Indians (under Tecumseh, who was also killed in the battle). Length, about 160 miles, navigable to Chatham.

Thames (thāmz). A navigable river in Connecticut, formed by the junction at Norwich of the Quinebaug and the Yantic. It empties into Long Island Sound below New London. Length, 16 miles.

Thames Embankment. A wide macadamized carriageway, with foot-pavements on each side, constructed 1864–70 by the Metropolitan Board of Works in London along the north bank of the Thames, from Blackfriars Bridge to Westminster. Strictly this is the Victoria Embankment, while the Chelsea Embankment, finished 1874, runs from Westminster Bridge to Vauxhall Bridge on the south bank, and the Chelsea Embankment, finished 1874, extends from the Chelsea Hospital to Albert Suspension Bridge on the north bank. These embankments have a granite wall on the river side; the whole area was once covered by the tide.

Thames Tunnel. A tunnel under the Thames at London, near the Tower, opened in 1843.

Thamien (thā'mi-en). A tribe of North American Indians which formerly inhabited the country between the Almaden mines and Alviso Landing, Santa Clara County, California; also, the native name of the site of Santa Clara mission. See Costanoans.

Theagenes (thē-aj'e-nēz). [Gr. Θεαγένης.] A tyrant of Megara, who ruled about the end of the 7th century B. C.

Theagenes and Chariclea (kar-i-klē'ä). An ancient romance by one Heliodorus, written in the 3d century. It recounts the loves and adventures of Theagenes, a Thessalian, and Chariclea, the daughter of Persina, queen of Ethiopia. It was rendered into English prose by Thomas Underdown (1577), and into French by Amyot. It "supplied with materials many of the early writers of romance. It was imitated in the composition of Achilles Tatius and subsequent Greek fables, and was the model of those popular fictions which, through the writings of Gomberville and Scudery, became for a considerable period so popular and prevalent in France." Dunlop. Also titled Æthiopica.

Theatins, or Teatines (thē'a-tinz). [From Theatus or Teate, Chieti.] A monastic order of regular clerks, founded at Rome in 1524, principally by the Archbishop of Chieti, in Italy, with the purpose of combating the Reformation. There were also Theatin nuns. The order acquired to some extent in Spain, Bavaria and Poland, but its influence is now confined chiefly to Italy.

Theatre, The. The first London theater. It was a wooden building erected by James Burbage, the father of Richard Burbage, in 1576, on the site of the priory of St. John the Baptist, Shoreditch, which was destroyed at the Reformation. It was taken down in 1596, and the Globe Bankside, built of the materials.

Théâtre de la Foire (tā-ätr' de la fwär). [F., "theatre of the fair."] A theater set up by provincial comedians at the fairs of St.-Germain and St.-Laurent, outside of Paris. These theaters had privileges, to the interests of commerce which the regular theaters feel not. The plays were originally riven by incidents, and their importance can be judged from as far back as 1595. Le Sage, Fuschet, Dominique, Dorneval, Lesage, Sodaine, and others wrote for it. Le Sage alone writing more than 100 little pieces, farces, etc., with or without songs.

Théâtre Français (tā-ätr' fron-sā'). Le. The most noted theater in France. It is situated on the Place du Théâtre Français, Rue St.-Honoré, near the Palais-Royal, in Paris. For eight days having been seized during the Revolution, Napoleon reinstated it in nearly sole possession of the right of producing classic drama. Its present constitution dates from 1812. It is, and has now the chief honors of the regular drama, and receives a subsidy from the government. It has a governing board of six, who have always been named by government officials for the early history of the Théâtre Français as a company of actors, see Comédie Française, La.

Theatre Royal. Same as Drury Lane Theatre (which see). It was the first London theater see named.

Thebaid (thē'bā-id). The. [L. Thebais, Gr. Θήβαις.] In ancient geography, the domain of Thebes in Egypt, or Upper Egypt. It included the valley of the Nile from about lat. 27° 45′ N. southward to Syene (about lat. 24° N.).

Thebaid, The. An epic poem by Statius, relating to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes.

This poem which is admitted by Merivale to be faultless in epic execution, and has been glorified by the admiration of Dante, occupied the author twelve years in the composing, probably from 76 to 84 A. D. Besides about much historical testimony to the labors expended on it. Had Statius been content with trifles such as are sketched in the "sylvæ," he might have been to this day a favorite author with the real poet. As it is, the minute beauties of his epic lie buried in such a wilderness of unattractive learning and secondhand mythological reminiscence, that few care to dig them out. Cruttwell, Hist. of Roman Lit., p. 427.

Thébaide (tā-bā-ēd'). La. A play by Racine, produced June 20, 1664, by Molière's company.

Thebais (thē'ba-is). A Greek epic poem of the Theban cycle, of unknown authorship, relating to a mythical war between Argos and Thebes.

Theban Eagle, or Theban Bard. Pindar.

Theban Legion. In Christian legend, a legion (from the Thebaid ?) in the army of Maximian which refused to obey the emperor's order to persecute the Christians, and was twice decimated and finally exterminated for its disobedience.

Thebaw (thē'bâ). The last king of Burma, deposed by the British in 1885.

Thebes (thēbz). [Gr. Θῆβαι, L. Thebæ or Thebæ (also Diospolis Magna, Egypt. No Amen.)] A city of ancient Egypt, situated on both sides of the Nile, in lat. 25° 58′ N., long. 32° 39′ E. Its chief properties are two of the kings, called by Greeks Memnon on the west bank. The village of Luxor now stands on the site. The remains of antiquity here are of great interest. The Colossi, or statues of Memnon, as commonly called, are two huge seated figures, originally monolithic, of Amenhotep III. (about 1500 B. C.), standing, as they now stand, before the ruined temple of that king. They are about 50 feet high, and are raised on sandstone pedestals measuring about 10 feet. They are now much weather-beaten and broken by earthquake. Sheeked by Cambyses, as related by many ancients. The northernmost figure is the famed vocal statue of Memnon, which is said to have emitted a sound when touched by the rays of the rising sun. The temple of Rameses I. and Seti I., or el Amen-Ra, is entered by a dromos of sphinxes 164 yards, two pylons, the second of which is followed by a small hypostyle before the fine pronaos colonnade, whose 12 pillars are of the early type resembling Doric bell-capitals. The portal-pylons on a columned hall surrounded by chambers, beyond which lies a large hall with four columns, preceding the now ruined sanctuary. On both sides of the main temple there are other halls and rooms; those on the west may have formed part of the royal palace. The sculptures, which refer to Rameses I., Seti I., and Rameses II., are of high interest. The tomb of Seti I. (about 1400 B. C.), No. 17 of the Tombs of the Kings (commonly called Belzoni's tomb, from its discoverer), is like its fellows, a rock-cut tomb. At its entrance, which is a mere shaft in the face of the cliff, a long, steep stair descends, followed by a narrow passage, another stair, and another passage, at the end of which there was a deep pit (now filled), the continuation of the passage beyond which was walled up, stuccoed, and painted over with scenes continuing those on the side walls. Beyond is a first hall with four pillars, elaborately sculptured and painted; then another hall, and a series of passages by which is reached the great hall, 27 feet square, with 6 pillars. A vaulted chamber 19 by 30 feet continues this hall, and contained the alabaster sarcophagus of the king. Other columned chambers flank this one, and still other passages and chambers extend on a lower level into the mountain, the total length open being 470 feet, and the depth below the entrance 180. The continuation of the tomb is choked, and its extent is unknown. The sculptures, historical, mythological, and ceremonial, with particular reference to the rites of royal burial, are exceedingly remarkable. With advance for endless differences of detail, this may be taken as a type of the Tombs of the Kings. The Tombs of the Queens, temple of Rameses III., Memnonium (see Ramesseum), temple of Luxor, temple of Karnak, obelisks, and sphinxes are also noteworthy. Thebes is first mentioned in the 11th dynasty. It supplanted Memphis as the great Egyptian center; was very flourishing in the 18th, 19th, and 20th dynasties (Thothmes III., Amenhotep III., Seti, Rameses II., Rameses III.); was after ward supplanted by cities of the Delta; and declined under the Ptolemies. See Ancient Egypt.

Thebes. [Gr. Θῆβαι, L. Thebæ or Thebe.] In ancient geography, the chief city of Bœotia, Greece, situated in lat. 38° 19′ N., long. 23° 19′ E.; the modern Thiva. It is said to have been founded by Cadmus (hence Cadmea, the citadel), and is celebrated in connection with Œdipus, the Seven against Thebes, and the expeditions of the Seven against Thebes and of the Epigoni. It was early settled by the Bœotians from Thessaly. In the war of Athens at the end of the 6th century B. C., was allied with the Persians at the battle of Platæa; was defeated by Athens at Œnophyta 456; and was under democratic and Athenian influence until 447; was the birthplace of Epaminondas; in Peloponnesian war; but a severe struggle with Sparta in the battle of Coronea in 394; had to yield to Sparta 382–379; defeated Sparta at Leuctra in 371, and at Mantinea in 362, and held the hegemony in Greece under the leadership of Epaminondas; took part in the Sacred War; was allied with Athens in the defeat at Charonea in 338; was destroyed by Alexander; by Philip; rebelled in 335, but was retaken by Alexander and destroyed; was rebuilt by Cassander; became insignificant under the Roman Empire; was important in the middle ages and noted for its silk manufactures; and was plundered by the Normans of Sicily and others. It was the reputed birthplace of Pindar, Amphion, Hercules, and Bacchus. Population of Thebes, about 4,000.

Thecla (thek'lā), Saint. A saint of Iconium, Asia Minor, said to have been a disciple of the apostle Paul.

Theia (thē'yā). See Titans.

Theiner (tī'ner), Augustin. Born at Breslau, April 11, 1804; died Aug. 10, 1874. A noted German Roman Catholic historian. He was prefect of the Vatican archives 1855–70, and was accused of misusing his official position for the advantage of the bishops of the opposition in the Vatican Council, and the key of the archives was taken away from him. He published many ecclesiastical works on the old monuments of Poland, Hungary, Slavs, etc.; "Geschichte des Pontifikats Clemens XIV." (1853); "Codex diplomaticus dominii temporalis Sanctæ Sedis" (1862: on the temporal power of the papacy), etc.

Theiss (tīs), Hung. Tisza (tē'so). The largest tributary of the Danube; the Slavonian Tisa, and the Latin Pathissus, or Tissus, or Tisia (less probably Tibiscus). It is formed by the union of the Black Theiss and White Theiss in the Carpathians on the border of Galicia; flows west, southwest, and south through Hungary; and empties into the Danube 26 miles north by west of Belgrad. Its principal tributaries are the Hernad on the right, and the Szamos, Körös, Maros, and Bega on the left. The chief towns on its banks are Szegedin, Csikay, Szolnok, Csongrad, and Tokay. Its length, estimated, about 700 miles; navigable for steamboats from Tokay.

Themis (thē'mis). [L., from Gr. Θέμις.] 1. A Greek goddess, the personification of law, order, and abstract right. — 2. An asteroid (No. 24) discovered by De Gasparis at Naples, April 5, 1853.

Themistocles (thē-mis'tō-klēz). [Gr. Θεμιστοκλῆς.] Born in the latter part of the 6th century B. C.; died about 460 (perhaps as late as 447 B. C.). A famous Athenian statesman and commander. He was a political leader in opposition to Aristides, who was ostracized in 483; was instrumental in increasing the naval resources of Athens; induced the Athenians to leave Athens for Salamis and the fleet, and brought about the victory of Salamis in 480; superintended the fortifications of Athens and of the Piræus, and the development of the naval power of Athens; and was ostracized about 470. He was charged with complicity in the treason of Pausanias. He lived in exile in Argos, Corcyra, Epirus, and elsewhere, and went to Persia in 465, when he was personally favored by Artaxerxes, and established himself at Magnesia.

Even after Leonidas had so gallantly perished, Themistocles had great difficulty in persuading them not to take flight in their ships; if once they went to sea, he said, all was lost. And then his reply to Eurybiades, which has been by some censured, appears to me to have been one of the grandest ever made by man. Eurybiades, in the heat of dispute, shook his staff in a menacing manner at him. "Strike, but hear," was the only return he made. To have drawn forth the sword by his side, and to have smote him dead for such an insult, would have been no more than natural; but any one could have done that. A poor dryman in a pothouse might have done it; but to forbear, to waive his own redress in order to extinguish resentments, and keep the troops united for his country's sake, this appears to me truly great!

Carlyle, Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., p. 31.

Thenard (tā-när'). Louis Jacques. Born at Louptière, near Nogent-sur-Seine, France, May 4, 1777; died at Paris, June 21, 1857. A French chemist, professor in the Collège de France; baron and peer of France. He discovered Thenard's blue, etc. He wrote "Traité élémentaire de chimie" (1815). He worked in connection with Gay-Lussac.

Theobald (thē'ō-bâld). Died 1161. An English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury 1139–61.

Theobald, Lewis. Born at Sittingbourne, Kent, England; died 1774. An English playwright, translator, Shakspearian commentator, and historical writer. He published "Shakspere Restored," abusing Pope (1726), and edited Shakspere (1733). He was the original hero of Pope's "Dunciad," as a revenge for "Shakspere Restored."

Theocritus (thē-ok'ri-tus). [Gr. Θεόκριτος.] Born at Syracuse: lived in the 3d century B. C. A famous Greek idyllic poet. He lived in Syracuse, Cos, and Alexandria. His idyls represent the life of herdsmen, shepherds, and fishermen.

Theocritus, a Syracusan, flourished about 270 B. C., under Ptolemy II. (Philadelphus), and is the earliest extensive of pastoral or bucolic poetry. Shepherds were tending for a prize in alternate or amebæic strains gave rise to this rustic lyric, which was followed by Moschus and especially Sicilian; hence Milton calls his "Lycidas," in which one shepherd is supposed to be mourning for another, a Doric lay or Sicilian muse. Besides some epigrams and fragments, we have 31 short poems under the name of Theocritus,—though the genuineness of some is doubtful,—mainly in the Doric dialect. Scarcely one half of these are properly pastoral in subject; but most of them may properly be called idyls, i. e. little pictures of life. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 141.

Theodelinde (thē-od'e-lind; G. pron. tā-ō-de-lin'dē). Lived about 590. A Bavarian princess and Lombard queen, daughter of Garibald I., and wife of Authari and later of Agco. She was instrumental in turning the Arian Lombards to the Roman Church.

Theoderic. See Theodoric.

Theodora (thē-ō-dō'rā). [Gr. Θεόδωρα, gift of God.] Born at Cyprus; died in Cyprus, died 547 or 548. An actress and courtezan (according to the usual account) who married Justinian about 523, and became Byzantine empress in 527. She took an important part in the administration of the affairs of the empire.

Theodora, surnamed "The Elder." Lived about the beginning of the 10th century. A Roman woman influential in Italy and in papal affairs; mother of Marozia.

Theodora, "The Younger." Lived in the 10th century. Daughter of Theodora the Elder; influential at Rome.

Théodora (tā-ō-dō-rä'). A play by Sardou, produced in 1884.

Theodore (thē'ō-dōr) I. [L. Theodorus, from Gr. Θεόδωρος, gift of God; F. Théodore, It. Teodoro, G. Theodor, Russ. Feodor.] Pope 642–649, an opponent of the Monothelites.

Theodore II. Pope 897.

Theodore II. (originally Kasa or Kassa). Born about 1818; committed suicide at Magdala, April 13, 1868. King of Abyssinia. He is said to have been educated as a priest, but became a robber leader. Repeated successes resulted in the conquest of Tigré and the proclamation of Theodore as king in 1855. He also conquered Shoa and waged war with the Gallas. At first a reformer, he became at last a cruel despot. His imprisonment of the British consul Cameron and other Europeans brought about the intervention of the English. Abyssinia was invaded by British troops under Napier in 1868, and Magdala was stormed April 13, 1868.

Theodore I., King of Corsica. See Neuhof.

Theodore of Tarsus. Died 690. An English prelate, of Greek origin: archbishop of Canterbury 668–690.

Theodoret (thē-od'ō-ret), L. Theodoretus (thē-od-ō-rē'tus). Born at Antioch about 390: died about 457. A Greek theologian, church historian, and exegete: a member of the school of Antioch. He became bishop of Cyrus or Cyrrhus (near the Euphrates) about 423; was deposed about 448; and was restored by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. He wrote commentaries, controversial works, a continuation of the history of Eusebius, lives of ascetics, letters, etc.

Theodoric (thē-od'ō-rik), "The Great." [LL. Theodoricus, Gr. Θεοδώριχος, accom. form of a Gothic name cognate with OHG. Deotrik, Diotrich, MHG. Dietrich, G. Dietrich, ruler of the people.] Born in Pannonia about 454; died Aug. 30, 526. A celebrated king of the East

Goths, son of the Amaling prince Theodemer. He passed his boyhood as a hostage at Constantinople; with his father invaded Mœsia in 475; and succeeded his father about 474. He started on the invasion of Italy late in 488; repeatedly defeated the Gepidæ; and defeated Odoacer at the Isonzo Aug. 28, 489, at Verona Sept. 30, and on the Adda Aug. 11, 490. On Feb. 27, 493, a peace was concluded according to which the two kings were to live together in Italy, Odoacer as the military subordinate of Theodoric. But in March Odoacer was slain by Theodoric at a banquet, and the latter became the sole ruler in Italy and the founder of the East-Gothic power there. He introduced many reforms. He put to death Boethius and Symmachus. In medieval German romance he is celebrated as Dietrich von Bern. Also spelled Theoderic.

It is no wonder that Theoderic became the subject of many fabulous stories, and that tradition represented his reign as having been almost a kingdom of heaven upon earth. Even before the sixth century closed, men told in Italy nearly the same story that was told in England respecting the days of Alfred—how the great king had made righteousness to prevail in his realm so that gold pieces could be left exposed on the highway for a year and a day without being stolen. Many of his sayings were recorded as proverbs in the land, and anecdotes were related to show how, like Solomon in the matter of the two mothers and their infants, Theoderic had displayed in the judgment seat his wonderful insight into human nature. But it was not in Italy or amongst the Goths that his legendary fame reached its highest point. The whole Teutonic race regarded his glory as their own, and his imagined deeds were the theme of popular songs in all the German lands. The story of "Dietrich of Bern" (the High German way of pronouncing "Theoderic of Verona") is indeed, as told in the poems, very different from the history of the real Theoderic. He is described as the vassal of Attila and the foe of Ermanaric, who is partly confounded with Odoacer; and in some of the songs "Dietrich" is even represented as vanquished, and as a fugitive or a captive. But amid all this strange distortion of the history, the character of the legendary Dietrich is essentially that of the Gothic king.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 171.

Theodorus. See Theodore.

Theodosia (thē-ō-dō'shi-ă). [Gr. Θεοδοσία, gift of God.] See Fenelosia.

Theodosian Code (thē-ō-dō'shi-an kōd). A collection of Roman laws from the time of Constantine to that of Theodosius II., comprised in 16 books, first published A. D. 438.

Theodosius (thē-ō-dō'shi-us). Executed at Carthage 376 A. D. A Roman general, distinguished for his services in Britain, on the Danube, and in Africa.

Theodosius I., "The Great." Born at Cauca, in northern Spain, about 346; died at Milan, Jan. 17, 395. Roman emperor, son of Flavius Theodosius, a general (chiefly noted for his campaigns in Britain) of Valentinian I. He commanded in Mœsia in 374; was made joint emperor by Gratian and ruler over the East in 379; defeated the Goths and other invaders; and in 383 signed the Goths in the empire. After the death of Gratian in 383 he had as colleagues Maximus, Valentinian II., and Eugenius. He defeated Arbogast and Eugenius at the Frigidus near Aquileia in 394, and became sole emperor. His ecclesiastical history he is noted for his submission to Ambrose.

Theodosius II. Born 401; died 450. Emperor of the East, son of Arcadius whom he succeeded in 408. He was controlled largely by his sister Pulcheria and his wife Eudocia. He carried on war with Persia. During his reign the empire was invaded by the Huns. The Theodosian Code was formed by his order.

Theodosius III. Byzantine emperor 716–717.

Theodosius, Obelisk of. See Obelisk of Theodosius.

Théodule (tā-ō-dül') Pass, or Matterjoch (mät'ter-yōch). A pass over the Alps, leading from Zermatt in Switzerland to Val Tournanche in Italy. Height, 10,900 feet.

Theognis (thē-og'nis). [Gr. Θέογνις.] Born in Megara: lived in the middle or last part of the 6th century B. C. A celebrated Greek elegiac poet.

Theognis (540 B. C.), a Dorian noble of Megara, has left us about 1 elegiac verses in the Ionic dialect—much more than we have from any early Greek elegist—in which he seeks to impress the orthodox doctrines of the Dorian aristocracy on a young Megarian noble named Cyrnus, and puts in many quaint bits of worldly wisdom by the way. His tone, and the respectability of his views, made him a standard author in the schools, and the text has been much confused by additions.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 54.

Theogony (thē-og'ō-ni), The. [Gr. Θεογονία, the origin of the gods.] An ancient Greek poem of 1,022 lines, attributed to Hesiod, treating of the origin of the order of nature from chaos and the origin of the gods. It was a standard work on theology among the Greeks.

Theon (thē'on). [Gr. Θέων.] Lived in the latter half of the 4th century A. D. An Alexandrian mathematician and astronomer, father of Hypatia. He wrote a commentary on the "Almagest."

Theophilus (thē-of'i-lus). [L., from Gr. Θεόφιλος, one who loves God; F. Théophile, It. Sp. Teofilo, Pg. Theophilo, G. Theophilus (Gottlieb).] In legend, the administrator of a bishopric in Adana, Asia Minor, said to have made a compact with the devil.

Theophrastus (thē-ō-fras'tus). [L., from Gr. Θεόφραστος.] Born at Eresus, Lesbos, about 372 B. C.: died 288 or 287 B. C. A Greek philosopher, a disciple of Aristotle whom he succeeded as head of the Peripatetic school. He wrote on the "History of Plants," etc.

Theophrastus of Eresus in Lesbos (374–287 B. C.) succeeded Aristotle at the head of the Lyceum, and followed his master in handling physical as well as moral science. We have from him two botanical works, "Researches about Plants," in nine books, and "Principles of Vegetable Life," in six books, which show him to have been a thorough and acute inquirer; also 30 short, lively sketches of character—such as "The Flatterer," "The Grumbler," "The Boastful Man," "The Man of Petty Ambition." These characters were the original models of those sketches which English writers produced in the 17th century, such as Hall's "Characterisms of Vertues and Vices," Overbury's "Characters or Witty Descriptions of the Properties of sundry Persons," and Earles "Microcosmography."

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 135.

Theophrastus Such (thē-ō-fras'tus such). The Impressions of. A series of essays by George Eliot, published in 1879.

Theopompus (thē-ō-pom'pus). [Gr. Θεόπομπος, sent of God.] Born in Chios about 378 B. C.: died about the end of the 4th century B. C. A Greek historian and rhetorician, the aristocratic and pro-Macedonian leader in Chios. His chief works are "Hellenics" and "Philippics" (fragments edited by Müller).

Theotocos (thē-ot'ō-kos). [From LGr. θεοτόκος, bearing God, mother of God.] The mother of God: a title of the Virgin Mary. Also Theotokos.

Theramenes (the-ram'e-nēz). [Gr. Θηραμένης.] Executed 404 B. C. An Athenian politician and commander. He was one of the leaders in the establishment of the oligarchic rule of the 400 which he later opposed; served at Cyzicus, Arginusæ, and elsewhere; was instrumental in procuring the condemnation of the Athenian generals after Arginusæ; was one of the negotiators for peace with Sparta; became one of the thirty tyrants; and was put to death through the influence of Critias.

Theresa, or Teresa (te-rē'să or tā-rā'să), Saint. [It., Sp. Teresa, Pg. Theresa, G. Therese, F. Thérèse.] Born at Avila, Spain, March 28, 1515; died at Alba de Liste, Spain, 1582. A Spanish saint and author. She entered the Carmelite order in 1534; established a reformed order of Carmelites in 1562; and became prioress at Avila in 1571. Her works, including "El camino de la perfeccion" ("Way of Perfection") and "El castillo interior" ("Castle of the Soul"), were published in 1587.

Theresienstadt, Slav. Terezin (tā-rā-zēn'). A town in Bohemia, situated on the Eger, near its junction with the Elbe, 32 miles north-northwest of Prague. It is the principal fortified place in Bohemia. Population (1890), 7,215.

Thereza Christina Maria. Born at Naples, March 14, 1822: died at Oporto, Portugal, Dec. 28, 1889. Empress of Brazil. See Pedro II.

Therma, Gulf of (thèr-mā'ik gulf). [L. Thermaicus Sinus.] The ancient name of the Gulf of Saloniki.

Thermidor (thèr-mi-dôr'; F. pron. ter-mē-dôr'). [F., from Gr. θέρμη, heat, and δῶρον, a gift.] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the eleventh month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning July 19 (with July 17 and 18 added) in the Gregorian calendar.

Thermidorians (thèr-mi-dō'ri-anz). The more moderate party in the French Revolution, who took part in or sympathized with the overthrow of Robespierre and his adherents on the 9th Thermidor, year 2 (July 27, 1794).

Thermopylæ (thèr-mop'i-lē). [Gr. Θερμοπύλαι, gate of the hot springs.] In ancient geography, a narrow pass from Thessaly to Locris, between Mount Œta and a marsh bordering the Maliac Gulf. The configuration of the land has been somewhat changed in recent times. Through it passed the only road from northern to southern Greece. Here, in 480 B. C., occurred one of the most famous conflicts of the Persian wars. A small army of Greeks under Leonidas defended the pass against a vast army under Xerxes. Their position was betrayed, and Leonidas seeing that his post was lost, sent away the 700 Thespians, who remained and were slain. Here, too, in 279 B. C., the allied Greeks attempted unsuccessfully to prevent the passage of the Gauls under Brennus; and here, in 191 B. C., the Romans under Glabrio defeated Antiochus the Great of Syria.

The springs at Thermopylæ are hot (about 100° Fahr.) and salt. There are two of them, which seem anciently to have been devoted respectively to male and female bathers (Tansan). They are enclosed within a rectangle of masonry, about two feet in depth, from which a cloud of vapour rises. The water is intensely salt to the taste, and very expensive.

Tozer, Lands of the Ancient Greeks, p. 344.

Théroigne de Méricourt (tā-rwäny' dē mā-rē-kôr'). Anne Joseph Terwagne, called. Born at Marcourt, Luxemburg, Aug. 13, 1762; died at Paris, June 9, 1817. An opponent of the French Revolution, an adherent of the Girondist party: called the "Amazon of the Revolution," the "Belle Liégeoise," the "Fury of the Gironde," etc. She played a prominent part in the taking of the Bastille, the expedition of the women to Versailles in Oct., 1789, the events of Aug. 10, 1792, etc. She was insane in her later years.

Theron (thē'ron). [Gr. Θήρων.] Tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily 488–472 B. C. He ruled also over Himera.

Thersites (thèr-sī'tēz). [Gr. Θερσίτης.] In Greek legend, the most hateful and ingnoble of the Greeks assembled before Troy. Shakspere introduces him in "Troilus and Cressida."

Thervings (ther'vingz). See the extract.

About the year 200, when they were living on the north shore of the Black Sea, the Gutans or Goths divided themselves into two great branches, the Thervings and the Greutings. These latter have left no further name; nothing is much better known in history. The Thervings were called Visigoths (i. e. West Goths), and the Greutings ostrogoths (East Goths). The Gothic wars were defensive, and to the situation which the two divisions then occupied, one east, the other west of the river Dniester; but by a curious coincidence they continued to occupy nearly the same relative latest days of Gothic history, for when the Goths conquered the south of Europe, the Visigoths went westwards to Gaul and Spain, while the Ostrogoths settled in Italy.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, pp. 57, 58.

Theseum (thē-sē'um). [Gr. Θησεῖον.] A temple at Athens, probably a temple of Hephaistos (Vulcan). It is one of the three most perfect surviving Greek temples. It is a Doric peripteros of Pentelic marble, of 6 by 13 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps measuring 64 by 104 feet. The columns are 19 feet 5 inches high, 3 feet 5 inches in base diameter. The cella has 2 columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos. The metopes of the eastern front and those nearest on the flanks are sculptured from the myths of Herakles and Theseus; the pediments were filled with sculptures, now lost, over the architrave and columns of both ends; the frieze is sculptured in relief. The chief subject represents a combat between Athenians and Thracians, that on the west a fight with centaurs.

Theseus (thē'sūs or thē'sē-us). [Gr. Θησεύς.] In Greek legend, the chief hero of Attica; son of Ægeus, king of Athens, and Æthra, daughter of Pittheus, king of Troezen. He was brought up at Troezen, and when he reached maturity set out for Athens, which he reached after wonderful adventures, and where he was recognized and acknowledged. He conquered the Marathonian bull, and when the Athenians sent their tribute of youths and maidens to Minos, he went with them and slew the Minotaur with the help of Ariadne, daughter of Minos, who fell in love with him. She gave him a sword and a clue of thread by means of which he found his way through the labyrinth. He sailed away with Ariadne, but deserted her on the island of Naxos. He also fought with the Amazons, who in turn invaded Attica; was one of the Argonauts; took part in the Calydonian hunt; cut off the head of Medusa; and performed other marvelous exploits.

Theseus. The Duke of Athens, a character in Shakspere's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The days of the Frank duchy of Athens have almost passed away from memory. But from the memory of English-speaking men at least they should not entirely pass. It was from the French and Italian robbers of that duchy that Shakespere borrowed that title which, to puny classical ears, seems so strange as to Theseus himself, the legendary statesman who wrought the union of the Attic towns, was brought on the stage, like Dea Roche or an Arcadian Amadis, Duke of Athens. And doubtless many readers of English and French history have been puzzled when, in the story of the fight of Crecy, a Duke of Athens appears as if he were as naturally the backbone of at such a moment as the Count of Alençon, or the Earl of Warwick.

Freeman, Hist. Essays, 1st ser., p. 289.

Thesiger (thes'i-jer). Frederic Augustus, Baron Chelmsford. Born May 31, 1827. An English general. He served as aide-de-camp to Major-General Markham in the Crimean campaign, and as assistant-general in the Abyssinian campaign of 1868; was adjutant-general of the forces in India 1869–74; became major-general in 1877; and had chief command of the British troops in the Zulu war of 1878 until relieved by Sir Garnet Wolseley. He gained a decisive victory over the Zulus under Cetywayo at Ulundi July 4, 1879.

Thespiæ (thes'pi-ē). [Gr. Θεσπιαί, Θέσπειαι, etc.] In ancient geography, a city in Bœotia, Greece, 8 miles west by south of Thebes. The city is mentioned by Homer (Catalogue). With Platæa it refused to give earth and water to the heralds of Xerxes; and it sent to Thermopylæ 700 of its men who fought and perished with the Spartans. The Thespians fought at Platæa in 479, and against Athens at Delium in 424. The walls of the city were razed by the Thebes. Thespiæ was noted for the worship of Eros and the Muses; Thespian Maids. The Muses. See Thespiæ.

Thespis (thes'pis). [Gr. Θέσπις.] Lived in the middle of the 6th century B. C. An Attic poet, the reputed founder of tragedy. He is said to have introduced monologues and perhaps dialogues into the dithyrambic choruses.

Thesprotia (thes-pró'ti-ă), or Thesprotis (thes'pro-tis). In ancient geography, a region in southwestern Epirus, lying near the sea.

Thessalonians (thes-ą-lō'ni-ąnz), Epistle to the. The title of two of the Pauline epistles in the New Testament. The main theme of both epistles is the second coming of Christ.

Thessalonica (thes'ą-lō-nī'kă). [Gr. Θεσσαλονίκη.] The ancient name of Saloniki.

Thessaly (thes'ą-li). [L. Thessalia, from Gr. Θεσσαλία.] A district which in ancient times formed the northeastern division of Greece. It was bounded by Macedonia on the north (separated by the Cambunian Mountains and Mount Olympus), the Thracian Sea and Magnesia (or its tributary Magnesia) on the east, Doris and Œtæa on the south, and Epirus on the west (separated by Mount Pindus). Thessaly contains the mountains Ossa, Pelion, and Othrys, and is traversed by the Peneus. Its chief divisions were Perrhæbia, Pelasgiotis, Thessaliotis Hestiæotis, Magnesia, and Phthiotis. Many of its cities, mountains, and valleys were celebrated in Greek legend. It was aristocratical and pro-Persian in its tendencies. The greater part of it was ceded by Turkey to Greece in 1881. The present inhabitants are Greeks, with some Turks and Albanians.

Thetford (thet'fōrd). A town in Norfolk and Suffolk, England, situated on the Little Ouse 31 miles northeast of Cambridge. It was the capital of East Anglia. Thomas Paine was born there. Population (1891), 4,247.

Thetis (thē'tis). [Gr. Θέτις.] 1. In Greek mythology, the chief of the Nereids: mother by Peleus of Achilles. —2. An asteroid (No. 17) discovered by Luther at Bilk, April 17, 1852.

Theurdank (toi'er-dängk). [G., 'dear thanks.'] 1. A name given to the emperor Maximilian I. —2. A German poetical romance, founded on the life of the emperor Maximilian I., and in part designed by him. It was published in 1517.

Theuriet (tœ-ryā'), André. Born at Marly-le-Roi, Oct. 8, 1833. A French literateur. He has published a number of volumes of poems, but is principally noted for his novels and tales.

Thévenot (tāv-nō'), Jean de. Born 1633; died 1667. A French traveler, nephew of Melchisédech Thévenot. He made journeys in the East 1655–1659, and traveled again in the East, particularly in Persia and India 1664–67. His collected "Voyages" were published in 1689.

Thévenot, Melchisédech. Born about 1620; died 1692. A French scholar. He published "Relations de divers voyages" (1663–72), "Recueil de voyages" (1681), etc.

Thiaki (thē-ä'ke). A modern name of Ithaca.

Thibaudeau (te-bo-dō'), Comte Antoine Claire de. Born at Poitiers, France, March 23, 1765; died at Paris, March 1, 1854. A French politician and historian. He became deputy to the Convention in 1792, and a member of the Mountain; became president of the Council of Five Hundred in Feb., 1796; was ennobled by Napoleon I.; lived in exile under the Bourbons; and was made senator by Louis Philippe in 1830. Among his works are "Mémoires sur la Convention et le Directoire" (1824), "Mémoires sur le Consulat" (1826), "Histoire générale de Napoléon Bonaparte" (1827–28, etc.).

Thibaut (te-bō') IV., Count of Champagne and King of Navarre. Born 1201: died 1253. A French ruler, noted as a poet.

Thibaut de Champagne, King of Navarre, . . . is indeed the most important single figure of early French lyrical poetry. . . . Thibaut's poems have much more than once or twice pointed the lustful thing that of M. Turbe; this contains eighty one pieces, not a few of which, however, are probably the work of others. The majority of them are Chansons d'Amour. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 68.

Thibet. See Tibet.

Thierry, or Thierri (ti-er'i; F. pron. tyā-rē'), I., or Theodoric (thē-od'ō-rik). Died 534. King of Austrasia; son of Clovis, and one of his successors in 511. See Clovis.

Thierry II. Died 613. King of Burgundy and later of Austrasia, second son of Childebert II.

Thierry III. Died 692. King of the Franks, a younger son of Clovis II. See Clovis II.

Thierry IV. Born 737. King of the Franks, one of the "rois fainéants." The government was administered by Charles Martel. See Charles.

Thierry (tyā-rē'), Amédée Simon Dominique. Born at Blois, France, Aug. 2, 1797; died at Paris, March 28, 1873. A French historian and politician, brother of J. N. A. Thierry. He was a time professor at Lesueur, after which he devoted himself to the study of history, and published a number of works. He was elected to the Academy in 1857. His chief works are "Histoire de la Gaule sous la domination romaine" (1840), "Histoire d'Attila" (1856), "Tableau de l'empire romain" (1862), "Récits de l'histoire romaine" (1860, 1864), "Saint-Jérôme" (1867), etc.

Thierry, Jacques Nicolas Augustin. Born at Blois, May 10, 1795; died at Paris, May 22, 1856. An eminent French historian. He devoted a free scholarship to the college of his native town, and finished with the lycée at Rouen. The best known of his works is a study at the Ecole Normale (1811–14), to which he also fell to a teacher. After a brief stay as a provincial college, he returned to Paris to follow up literature as a means of livelihood. For a while he worked in collaboration with the philosopher Saint-Simon, and published with him 3 books (1814–17). Then he contributed several original papers to various periodical publications. These papers he subsequently fused together, and composed in this way his "Histoire de la conquête de l'Angleterre par les Normands" (1825) and his "Lettres sur l'histoire de France" (1827). In 1826 he became completely broken down in health, and was left blind and paralyzed. The remainder of his life was to be done through the medium of secretaries. With their help he published his "Dix ans d'études historiques" (1834), his "Récits des temps mérovingiens" (1840), and his "Essai sur l'histoire de la formation et des progrès du tiers-état" (1853).

Thiers, Louis Adolphe. Born at Marseilles, April 15, 1797: died at St.-Germain-en-Laye, near Paris, Sept. 3, 1877. A distinguished French statesman and historian. He was of humble origin. After graduating from college he studied law at Aix, and came to Paris late in the year 1821. A couple of years later he started out to seek his fortune in Paris. He tried his hand at journalism, and was immediately successful. For several years he remained on "Le Constitutionnel," and in 1830 helped in the foundation of "Le National." His time had been largely taken up with serious studies which resulted in his "Histoire de la Révolution" (4 vols., 1823–27). Another one of his early works, "Law et son système de finances," appeared in 1826, and was edited anew in a second edition "Histoire de Law." He took an active part in establishing the monarchy of July, 1830, and was rewarded by Louis Philippe, who appointed him to the highest positions in the state. The history of the times was written by Thiers, and appeared in full under the title "La monarchie de 1830." While retaining his interest in the general government of the country, Thiers began to devote his attention more particularly to historical research, and finally published his great work "Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire" (20 vols. 1845–60). During the Franco-German war of 1870–71 he was prominent in diplomatic capacity, and was especially active in negotiating with Bismarck the conditions of peace. After the fall of Napoleon III. (March 1, 1871) he was placed at the head of the executive power in the new French republic, and a few months later became its president. Besides the works already mentioned, Thiers contributed numerous articles to newspapers and reviews, and published pamphlets on a variety of subjects. At the time of his death he was engaged on a work of a philosophical character, which he left in a fragmentary condition.

Thirlwall (thèrl'wâl), Connop. Born at Stepney, London, Jan. 11, 1797: died at Bath, England, July 27, 1875. An English historian, critic, and prelate. He was educated at the Charterhouse and Cambridge, and took high honors in both law and theology. He was bishop of St. David's 1840–74. His chief work is a "History of Greece" (1835–47). He translated Schleiermacher's "Critical Essay" with Hare translated Niebuhr's "History of Rome" (1828). His "Literary and Theological Remains," including his charges, were edited by Perowne and Stubbs, and his "Letters" by others.

Thirteen Communes, The. Tredici Comuni (trā-dē'chē kō-mō'nē). A locality in the province of Verona, Italy, in the vicinity of Badia. It has long been noted for the preservation of a Germanic dialect (Cimbro), now nearly supplanted by Italian. Compare Cimbri.

Thirty, The. See Thirty Tyrants, The.

Thirty Tyrants, The. 1. An aristocratic body which usurped the government of Athens 404–403 B. C. The most notable was Critias. They were expelled by the democratic party under the lead of Thrasybulus. A popular name given collectively to the body of pretenders to the Roman Empire under the reigns of Valerian, Gallienus, etc. Among them were Tetricus and Odenathus.

Thirty Years' War, The. A religious and political war in central Europe which involved Germany and various countries. It was caused by the friction between the Protestants and Catholics in the Empire; and the immediate occasion was the throwing of some Bohemian officials from the windows of the palace at Prague in 1618. This was the first act of the war in Bohemia. The following is a summary of the main events: In 1619 the emperor Matthias died, and was succeeded in the Hapsburg dominions and as emperor by Ferdinand II., but Frederick V., elector of the Palatinate, was chosen as a rival king by the Bohemians; in Nov. 1620, the Catholic League defeated Frederick at the White Mountain; in 1621 Tilly and the Catholic League were victorious at Wimpfen and Höchst; in 1623 Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, was made elector; in 1625 Christian IV. of Denmark became the leader of the Protestants; in 1626 Tilly defeated Christian IV. at Lutter, and Wallenstein, the Imperialist general, defeated Mansfeld at Dessau; in 1629 the Edict of Restitution was issued by Ferdinand (see Restitution); in 1630 Wallenstein was dismissed, while Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden became the Protestant leader. The events of 1631 were the storming of Magdeburg by Tilly and the victory of Gustavus at Breitenfeld; of 1632, the successes of Gustavus, the reentry of Wallenstein to the Imperialist service, and the victory and death of Gustavus at Lützen (Nov. 6); of 1634, the Imperialist victory at Nördlingen, and the murder of Wallenstein; of 1635, the treaty of Prague between Saxony and Ferdinand II., and the interference of France on the Protestant side under the lead of Richelieu; of 1636, the victory of the Swedes at Wittstock; of 1637, the accession of the emperor Ferdinand III.; of 1642, the victory of the Swedes at Breitenfeld; and of 1643, 1644, and 1645, generally French and Swedish victories under Condé, Turenne, and Torstenson. In 1648 the war was terminated by the treaty of Westphalia (which see). In general the Protestants were strong in northern Germany, the Catholics in southern Germany. Spain was the chief ally of the emperor; France, Sweden, and Denmark were the principal allies of the Protestants. The main profits of the war fell to France and Sweden. Germany suffered severely in loss of life, property, and morals.

This (this). In ancient geography, a city in Upper Egypt, near Abydos or perhaps identical with it.

Thisbe (thiz'bē). [Gr. Θισβή.] In classical legend, a maiden of Babylon, beloved by Pyramus. Living in adjoining houses, they were able to converse through a hole in the wall without the knowledge of their parents, who opposed their marriage. A rendezvous was appointed at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbe, who appeared first, was frightened by a lion, and, running away, dropped her mantle which the beast soiled with blood. Pyramus, seeing the blood, and believing that Thisbe had been slain, killed himself under a mulberry-tree, the fruit of which was ever after bloodred. Shakspere introduced the story into the farcical interlude in the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Thistle (this'l). A steel yacht (cutter), designed by George L. Watson, and launched at Glasgow April 21, 1887. Her principal dimensions were: length over all, 106·95 feet; length on water line, 79·03; beam, 20·03; draught, 13·80; displacement, about 138 tons. She was designed expressly to capture the America's cup, but lost the cup races to Volunteer. She was afterward sold to the Emperor of Germany and rechristened Meteor.

Among his works are "Die Lehre vom Sünder und Versöhner" ("The Doctrine of the Sinner and Redemption"), "Stunden der Andacht" ("Hours of Devotion," 1840), commentaries on the Sermon on the Mount, Hebrews, and Psalms, an answer to Strauss's "Leben Jesu" ("Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte," 1837), "Vorgeschichte des Rationalismus" (1853–1862), "Geschichte des Rationalismus" (1865), etc.

Thomas (tom'ąs). Saint, or Didymus. [Heb. 'a twin'; Gr. Θωμᾶς; L. Didymus, from Gr. ὁ δίδυμος, a twin; It. Tommaso, Sp. Tomás, Pg. Thomas or Thomaz.] One of the twelve apostles: according to tradition, an evangelist in Parthia and India, where he suffered martyrdom.

Thomas of Bayeux. See Thomas the Rhymer.

Thomas of London. Born at London, 1118: murdered in Canterbury cathedral, Dec. 29, 1170. An English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of a rich merchant, and his career was advanced by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, in whose household he was about 1142. He became archdeacon of Canterbury in 1154, and chancellor of Henry II. in 1155, an office he filled with great magnificence; and, though only in deacon's orders, was suddenly appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1162. He became a strong advocate of the church's rights, defending her against the king whose partizan he had previously been. He refused to consent to the constitutions of the council of Clarendon, curtailing clerical privileges, but was prevailed upon to do so by the Pope. He was tried by Henry for breach of allegiance in endeavoring to excommunicate Richard, and his property was confiscated and his ecclesiastical revenue sequestered. He finally escaped to France, and thence to Rome, where the Pope reinstated him in his see. After much correspondence and many threats of excommunication against the English bishops, he was reconciled with Henry in 1170, and returned to England; but his temper was as haughty as ever, and Henry prayed "to be rid of this turbulent priest." Four knights, overhearing this hasty exclamation, slew Becket before the altar of St. Benedict in the north transept of Canterbury cathedral, Dec. 29, 1170. In 1173 he was canonized, and in 1220 his bones were removed to Trinity Chapel, where they were for several centuries the object of pilgrimages. Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" were told on a pilgrimage to his shrine. Henry VIII. destroyed it, and burned and scattered his bones. Also Thomas Becket or à Becket.

Thomas of Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester. Born at Woodstock, England, Jan. 7, 1355: murdered at Calais, France, Sept. 8, 1397. The youngest son of Edward III., a leading politician in the reign of Richard II.

Thomas the Rhymer, or Thomas of Erceldoune (now Earlston). Lived about 1225–1300. A Scottish poet, noted in folk-lore and Arthurian legend as a prophet and a guide to the mysterious halls beneath the Eildon Hills. According to the popular story, the Queen of Faery came to him as he sat under the Eildon tree, and carried him to Fairyland, where they lived in happiness for three years, at the end of which time she brought him back to the Eildon tree and told him of many things that were to happen in the wars between England and Scotland. He was called "True Thomas" from the truth of these prophecies. He finally disappeared in a forest, following a hart and hind, and was seen no more. (Compare Frauhmærer.) "The Romance and Prophecies of Thomas of Erceldoune" has been edited by Dr. Murray for the Early English Text Society (1875). Sir Walter Scott attributed to him the poem "Sir Tristrem," a 13th-century romance, which he edited from the Auchinleck MS. in 1804; but it is not now thought to be his. "Sir Tristrem" was edited by McNeill in 1886 for the Scottish Text Society.

The charter [dated 1290, in which his son describes himself as the heir of Thomas Rymour de Ercildoun quoted in the "Minstrelsy" contains written evidence that the epithet of Rymour was peculiar to our Thomas, and was dropped by his son, who designates himself simply Thomas of Ercildoun, son of Thomas the Rymour of Ercildoune, which I think is conclusive on the subject. Pursuing this discussion, I have scorned to avail myself of the tradition of the country, as well as the suspicious testimony of Boece, Dempster, &c., promulgated probably upon that tradition, which uniformly affirms the named Thomas to have been Learmont or Lermont, and that of the Rhymer a personal epithet. This circumstance, I hope, induces us fairly to conclude that some of his descendants had taken that name—certain it is that his castle is called Lermont's Tower, well known to be so to the country people by that name as by the appellation of the Rhymer.

Thomas Aquinas, or of Aquino. See Aquinas, Thomas.

Thomas Becket or a Becket. See Thomas of London.

Thomists (tō'mists). The followers of Thomas Aquinas. He held two sources of knowledge, faith and reason—the doctrines of unconditional predestination and efficacious grace, and a physical as well as moral efficacy, and denied the doctrine of the immaculate conception. His theology, embodied in his great work "Summa theologiæ," was based on a philosophical system gathered from either the Bible or the traditional teaching of the church. It was an attempt to reconcile Aristotelian philosophy with the Christian faith. It is of very high authority in the Roman Catholic Church, and its influence is great even outside of that church.

Thompson (tomp'son), Benjamin, Count Rumford. Born at Woburn, Mass., March 26, 1753; died at Auteuil, near Paris, Aug. 21, 1814. An American scientist and political adventurer. Having been refused a commission in the continental army, he offered his services to the British, and in 1776 was sent to England. He was knighted by George III. William Howe. Here he was given a place in the administrative service by lord George Germaine, secretary of state for the colonies, and rose to the post of undersecretary of state (1780). He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1779. On the retirement of his patron, he returned in 1780 to America, and raised in New York the "King's American Dragoons," of which he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel. He returned to England before the close of the war, and in 1784 accepted a confidential appointment to the court of Bavaria. He subsequently entered the court of the Elector of Bavaria. He reorganized the military establishment of Bavaria, and introduced important economic and labor reforms, with the result that he was rapidly promoted to the highest offices in the state, including those of commander-in-chief of the general staff, minister of war, and superintendent of the police. He was created a count in the Holy Roman Empire in 1791. Owing to ill health he quitted Bavaria about 1798, and was, for a time a private agent of Bavaria in England. He removed to Paris in 1802, and in 1804 married as his second wife the widow of the French chemist Lavoisier. The rest of his life was spent at his wife's villa in Auteuil. He gave 5,000 the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and founded a like amount to the Royal Society of London to found prizes bearing his name for the most important discoveries in heat and light. He also founded the chair with which the Rumford professorship of the physical and mathematical sciences as applied to the useful arts has been erected.

Thospitis (thos-pi'tis). The ancient name of Lake Van.

Thoth (thōth or tōt), or Tehuti (te-hū'te). An Egyptian divinity whom the Greeks assimilated to their Hermes (Mercury). He was the god of speech and hieroglyphics or letters, and of the reckoning of time, and the scorcered wisdom. The cynocephalous ape and the ibis were sacred to him. He is represented as a human figure, usually with the head of an ibis, and frequently with the moon-disk and crescent. Also Tat.

Thot (Ethoti) is generally drawn with an ibis head, or as a dog-headed figure in him the moon-god, but he generally appears as the god of civilization (of intelligence and writing), or as the god who protects and revives dead bodies. He is worshipped more especially at Sesennu (Hermopolis) and in the peninsula of Sinai.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 410.

Thothmes (thoth'mēz or tōt'mēs) I., Egypt. Tehuti-mes, or Aa-kheper-ka-Ra. [Tehuti's child.] Lived about 1633 B.C.; married an Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty. He was a successful warrior, and conducted a campaign as far as the Euphrates. An important record of his deeds is preserved in an inscription on the rocks in the neighborhood of the Lupa cataract.

Thothmes II., or Tehuti-mes, or Aa-kheper-en-Ra. Lived about 1600 B.C. (Brugsch). An Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty, son of Thothmes I. He married his sister Hatshepsu, who obtained control of the government.

Thothmes III., or Tehuti-mes, or Men-Kheper-Ra. Lived about 1600 B.C. (Brugsch). A famous Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty. He reigned for 54 years, and under him "Egypt, to use the poetic expression of the time, 'placed her frontiers where the sun sets.' Her empire consisted of the whole of Abyssinia, the Sudan, Nubia, Egypt proper, Syria, Mesopotamia, Irak-Arabia, Kurdistan, and Armenia" (Maspero). He married his sister Hatshepsu, widow of Thothmes II. The records of his reign are extensive.

Now, Thothmes III. was the Alexander of ancient Egyptian history. He conquered the known world of his day; he carved the names of six hundred and seventy-eight nations on temples and captured cities on the walls of Karnak; and he set up a tablet of Victory in the Great Temple. It is in this famous tablet, discovered in 1881, which records people known to science, that we find the Greeks mentioned for the second time in Egyptian history.

Thrace (thrās). A region in southeastern Europe, with varying boundaries: the ancient Thracia (Gr. Θρᾴκη). In early times it was regarded as the entire region north of Greece. As a Roman province it was bounded by the Hæmus or Balkan (separating it from Mœsia) on the north; the Euxine and Bosporus on the east; the Propontis, Hellespont, and Ægean Sea on the south, and the Nestus (separating it from Macedonia) on the west: corresponding, therefore, to Eastern Rumelia and part of Turkey. The principal mountain-range is the Rhodope; the principal river, the Hebrus. Greek colonies were planted at Byzantium, on the Thracian Chersonesus, and at Abdera, Perinthus, etc. The climate was notable for its severity, and the inhabitants for their ferocity and barbarity. The affinities of the ancient inhabitants are unknown: they may have been ancestors of the Wallachs. In the 5th century B.C. Thrace was largely under the rule of Teres, father of the Odrysæ. It was successively under Macedonian, Roman, Byzantine, and Turkish rule.

The wide stretch of country between the lower course of the Danube and the shores of the Ægean and the Propontis was occupied in antiquity by the tribe of the Thracians, which Herodotus (v. 3) regards as the greatest of all peoples next to the Indi. The scanty remains of the Thracian language are enough to establish traces of its Indo-Germanic character, but not enough to define its position in the Indo-European family more closely. Certain it is, however, that from hence a large part of Asia Minor received its Indo-Germanic population. In the first place, it is known that the Thracians themselves spread eastwards over the strait a considerable distance towards Asia. According to the unanimous opinion of antiquity, again, the Phrygians emigrated from Europe, and were originally connected with the Thracians.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 430.

Thrace. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of the East. It extended from the Ægean and the Propontis to the lower Danube, comprising the eastern parts of Bulgaria and Rumelia.

Thuanus. See Thou.

Thuban (thö-bän'). [Ar. al-thu'bán, the dragon.] The star a Draconis, now of the fourth magnitude only, though three hundred years ago it was estimated as of the second. About B. C. 2750 it was the pole-star, and at one time was within 10° of the true pole itself.

Thucydides (thū-sid'i-dēz). [Gr. Θουκυδίδης.] Born probably 471 B. C.; died probably about 401 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian. He was a native of Athens; belonged to a family which claimed blood relationship with Miltiades and Cimon; is said to have been a pupil of Antiphon of Rhamnus and of Anaxagoras; and possessed an ample fortune, part of which was invested in gold-mines in Thrace, opposite Thasos. In 424 he commanded an expedition sent to the assistance of Amphipolis against Brasidas, but failed to prevent the capture of the city, and in consequence went into exile (whether entirely or voluntarily is unknown), from which he returned twenty years later, in 403. He was commonly supposed by the ancients to have died a violent death soon after, probably at Athens. He began a "History of the Peloponnesian War," which he did not live to finish, the narrative ending in 411, seven years before the end of the war. The Greek text was first printed by Aldus at Venice in 1502.

Thugut (tö'göt), Baron Franz Maria von. Born at Linz, Austria, March 8, 1734; died at Vienna, May 29, 1818. An Austrian diplomatist and politician. He was ambassador at Constantinople 1771–76; was employed later in various diplomatic missions, and was minister of foreign affairs for nearly half of the period 1794–1800. Among the events of his ministry were the war with France, the loss of Belgium and Lombardy, and the annihilation of parts of Poland and of Venice.

Thule (thū'lē). [Gr. Θούλη.] The name given by Pytheas of Marseilles to a region or island north of Great Britain, the position of which has been for more than two thousand years the subject of investigation and a matter of controversy. Of the voyage of Pytheas, who was probably nearly contemporaneous with Alexander the Great, nothing is known with certainty, since none of his writings has been preserved. It is, on the whole, most probable that he followed the east coast of Great Britain of whose size he got a very much exaggerated idea, and that he obtained information in regard to the groups of islands lying still further north—namely, the Orkney and Shetland Islands which he embraced under the general name of Thule. From what he is believed to have said in regard to the length of the day in Thule at the summer solstice, it is evident that, as he is known to have been a good astronomer, he thought that this land was situated on or near the Arctic Circle. The Romans frequently added to Thule the qualification of "Ultima Thule," the latter, and, from classic times down to the present day, Thule, besides remaining a subject for voluminous controversy among geographical critics, has been in constant use by poets and others as designating some unknown, far-distant, northern, or purely mythical region, or even some goal, not necessarily geographical, sought to be attained. This use of Thule (Ultima Thule) is found throughout the literature of all the cultivated languages of Europe.

"Ultima Thule," the furthest of the "Britannic Isles," has been identified with all sorts of localities since the time when Pytheas sailed with his Cimbric guides to the country of the midnight sun. The controversy is boundless, and its details are too tedious to be examined at length. But we may select sufficient evidence to show why the story of the journey should be believed, and to justify the selection of Lapland as the northern limit of the expedition. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 64.

Thun (tön). A town in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated at the exit of the Aare from the Lake of Thun, 16 miles southeast of Bern. It is a frequented tourist center, and has considerable trade. Population (1888), 5,505.

Thuringia (thū-rin'ji-ä). G. Thüringen (tü'ring-en). F. Thuringe (tü-ranzh'). A region in central Germany, included between the Harz, the Werra, the Saale, and Franconia. It comprises in large part the hilly and mountainous district of Thüringerwald. The Thuringians were probably descended from the ancient Hermunduri, with admixture of other tribes. They appeared in history in the 5th century, and extended their power from the Elbe to the Danube; but were overthrown by the Austrasian Franks in the first part of the 6th century. Thuringia subsequently prospered, independent. Later it was an important landgravate; the line of landgraves became extinct in 1247. In 1265 Meissen secured most of the Thuringian territory, which eventually passed to the Saxon states. Hesse secured a small portion. See Saxe-Thuringia.

Thyrsus (thėr'sus). The ancient name of the Tirso.

Ti (tē). See the extract.

In marked contrast to the plebeian type of Ra-em-ka is the limestone statue of Ti, a courtly dignitary of the Fifth Dynasty. No less than nineteen statues of Ti were found immured in the substance of the walls of his tomb, which is one of the most beautiful in Egypt. The figure stands about seven feet high, the flesh-tints being of a pale brick-dust color, and the wig yellow. The pose of the head is spirited, and the expression of the face is open and lifelike. The shoulders are very square, his arms long, his body slender; this being the characteristic type of the well-grown fellah of the present day.

Tiahuanacu (tē-ä-wä-nä'kō). [So called from a neighboring village.] A remarkable group of very ancient ruins in western Bolivia, 12 miles from the southern end of Lake Titicaca, near the Peruvian frontier, and about 12,900 feet above the sea. They include remains of [illegible] very large quadrilateral buildings, monolithic doorways, broken statues, etc. The material is generally hard sand-[illegible] have been transported 25 miles by water and 15 by land. The blocks were cut and fitted together with great skill, the joining being by mortises and bolts. Many of them are elaborately sculptured. The largest and most remarkable of the monolithic doorways is 13 feet wide, over 7 feet high (now above the ground) and 2 feet thick; above the level of the door it is covered with sculptures in low relief, consisting of a central human figure and four rows of smaller figures, some with condors' heads and all with crowns and sceptres. The structure called the "fortress" is an artificial mound or truncated pyramid, 650 feet long by 450 wide and 50 high, originally formed with terraces which were faced with blocks of cut stone. The style of architecture and sculpture in the Tiahuanacu buildings is absolutely unique, and the exactness of the squaring and joining is unsurpassed even by the most noted ancient and modern works of the old world. Many of the walls have been destroyed by treasure-hunters, or to obtain materials for buildings in the vicinity and even in La Paz; portions have been blown up with gunpowder. The Tiahuanacu ruins had been noticed long before the spanish conquest, and the Indians knew nothing of their origin. The best authorities now connect them with the traditional legend of Manco Capac. As the cold and sterile region about Lake Titicaca is unfitted to support a large population, it is conjectured that the buildings had a religious or ceremonial object. Some traditions connect them with the first Incas. Also written Tiahuanaco.

Tiamat (tē-ä'mät), In Assyro-Babylonian cosmogony, the personification of the primeval chaos, the beginning of all. It is allotted to the gods, to fate and order, and is defeated in the fight of a hero, Bel-Merodach conquers the monster in a struggle, driving a wind into its opened jaw and splitting it in twain.

Roman emperor, son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia Drusilla, and stepson of Augustus: infamous for his vices and cruelty. He was divorced by command of Augustus from his wife Vipsania Agrippina (daughter of Agrippa), and 11 B. C. married Julia, daughter of Augustus and widow of Agrippa; served in Spain, in Armenia against the Rhætians and Vindelicians, and on the Danube; became consul in 13 B. C., and tribune in 6 B. C.; spent several years peacefully in exile in Rhodes; returned to Rome in 2 A. D.; was adopted by Augustus; in 4 A. D. conducted several campaigns in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia; and succeeded Augustus as emperor in 14 A. D. His administration of the affairs of the empire was generally successful, but his private life, especially in his later years (which were passed in large part on the island of Capri), was marked by gross vices, and cruelty toward his enemies. His chief minister was Sejanus.

Tiberius. Byzantine emperor 578–582.

Tibesti (tē-bes-tē'), or Tu (tō). A district in the eastern part of the Sahara, in the region inhabited by the Tibbus.

Tibet, or Thibet (tib'et or tī-bet'). A land in central Asia: a dependency of China. It is bounded by the Kwenlun Mountains on the north (separating it from Eastern Turkestan), by China proper on the east, by the Himalaya on the south (separating it from British India, Bhutan, Nepal, etc.), and by Kashmir on the west. Chief city, Lhasa. The surface is an elevated table-land: the interior is little known. It contains the sources of the Indus, Brahmaputra, Yangtse-Kiang, and other larger rivers. The foreign and military affairs of Tibet are directed by temporal delegates, the supreme civil authority is vested in the dalai-lama. The inhabitants are of Mongoloid race; the religion Lamaism and the Bon religion. Tibet was conquered by China in 1720. Area, about 600,000 square miles. Population, about 6,000,000.

Tiburon (tē-bō-rōn'). ['Shark' Island.] An island in the Gulf of California, about lat. 29° N., belonging to the state of Sonora, Mexico. Length, about 34 miles. The only inhabitants are a few Seri Indians.

Tichborne (tich'bōrn), Roger Charles. Born Jan. 5, 1829; died at sea, 1854. The presumptive heir to the Tichborne estates in England. He sailed from Rio de Janeiro for New York, April 20, 1854, on the Bella, which was lost. A famous trial for the recovery of the estates by Arthur Orton, the Tichborne claimant (see Orton), was decided against the claimant in 1872. Orton was tried for perjury 1873–74, and imprisoned 1874–1884.

Ticino (tē-chē'nō). [L. Ticinus, F. Tessin, G. Tessin.] A river in Switzerland and Italy, formed by the junction of two head streams near Airolo. It traverses the Val Leventina and the riviera in the canton of Ticino, Lago Maggiore, and the Lombard plain, and joins the Po near Pavia. Its chief tributaries are the Brenno and Moesa. Length, about 150 miles.

Ticino. [F. Tessin, G. Tessin.] A canton of Switzerland, bounded by Valais, Uri, Grisons, and Italy. Capital, Bellinzona. It sends 6 members to the National Council. The inhabitants are Italian in race and language, and Roman Catholic in religion. It was subjugated by Rome with the rest of Gallia Cisalpina, and fell to the power of the barbarians in the 5th century, of the Longobards in the 6th, and of the Franks in the 8th. In the middle ages it was held in large part by Milan. The Val Leventina was conquered by Uri in 1403, and finally in 1440; and the remainder of Ticino was taken by the confederates and the Forest Cantons about 1500. It was divided into the cantons of Bellinzona and Lugano in 1798, and the former became Ticino in 1803. A constitution was adopted in 1830. The canton has been disturbed by contests between the Ultramontanes and the Liberals, and the intervention of federal troops was necessary in 1876 and 1885. Area, 1,085 square miles. Population (1888), 126,751.

Tieck (tēk), Ludwig. Born at Berlin, May 31, 1773: died there, April 28, 1853. A German poet and critic. He studied at Halle, Gottingen, and Erlangen. Subsequently he lived alternately in Berlin, Jena, and Dresden. In 1806 he undertook a journey to Italy, and in 1817 to England. In 1820 he was made a member of the direction of the royal theater at Dresden. In 1841 he was called to Berlin by Frederick William IV., by whom he was granted a pension. Among his many works in almost all departments of literature are particularly to be mentioned his collections of popular tales, partly from old German sources, partly original, "Volksmärchen" ("Folk Tales," 1797) and "Phantasus" (1812–17), the romantic novel "Franz Sternbalds Wanderungen" ("Franz Sternbald's Wanderings," 1798), the classical translation of "Don Quixote" (1799–1801), a modern German version of Middle High German "Minnelieder" ("Minnesongs," 1803). After 1825 he was engaged upon a translation of Shak-pere to complete the work begun by A. W. von Schlegel. In 1825 and 1827, during his connection with the Dresden theater, he published a series of dramatic criticisms under the title of "Dramaturgische Blätter" ("Dramaturgic Leaves"). Other works are the two novels with which he began his literary career, "Abdallah" and "William Lovell"; the comedies "Blaubart" ("Bluebeard"), "Der gestiefelte Kater" ("Puss in Boots"), "Prinz Zerbino" ("Prince Zerbino"); the dramas "Leben und Tod der heiligen Genoveva" ("The Life and Death of St. Genevieve"), "Kaiser Oktavianus" ("Emperor Octavian"), "Fortunat" ("Fortunatus"). Among his many shorter stories, written between 1821 and 1840, are especially to be named "Das Dichterleben" ("The Poet's Life"), wh h describes the youth of Shakspere, and "Der Tod des Dichters" ("The Death of the Poet"), whose motive is the death of the poet Camoens. He wrote, besides, many lyrics, the best of which are in his Italian journey in 1806–06. He was the most prolific of the poets of the Romantic school in Germany. A collection of his writings, made by himself, was published in Berlin, 1828–46, in 20 vols.; his critical writings, in the same way, appeared in Berlin 1852–54; and his short stories ("Gesammelte Novellen") were published in Berlin, 1852–53, in 12 vols. His posthumous works ("Nachgelassene Schriften") appeared at Leipsic, 1855, in 2 vols.

Tiglath-Pileser (tig′lath-pi-lē′zėr). [Assyr. Takulti-pal-eshara, my support is the son of Eshara (i. e. Adar the god of war and the chase′).] The name of three Assyrian kings. (a) King 1120–1100 B. C., one of the most warlike and energetic of Assyrian rulers. According to inscriptions on prisms found in the ruins of Kileh Sherghat (on the site of the ancient city of Ashur), he undertook campaigns against forty-two countries and nations, ranged from the Euphrates to Kummuch (Commagene), Hittites, the "Aramean river-land," the country of Nairi, and Babylonia. He also indulged in the pleasures of the chase, and relates that he killed with his own hand 10 elephants and 920 lions. (b) King about 950–930 B. C. (c) King 745–727 B. C. In the Old Testament he bears the name of Phul. In 741 he conquered, after a three years' siege, the city of Arpad (modern Tel-Erfad, north of Aleppo). In 738 he brought nineteen districts of Hamath under Assyrian supremacy. In the same year he received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Samaria (2 Ki. xv. 19), Hiram of Tyre, and many other kings of Syria. Several years later Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel entered into a coalition against Assyria, and waged war against Ahaz of Judah because he would not join this alliance (Isa. vii.). At the behest of Ahaz, Tiglath-Pileser again marched against the west 734–732. Gaza was killed, and the kingdom of Damascus destroyed, and many cities were taken from Israel (2 Ki. xv. 29), Pekah being left as a vassal king. While in Damascus the Assyrian king received tribute from Ahaz of Judah, and the kings of Moab, Ascalon, Edom, Gaza, etc. For a third time Tiglath-Pileser took a hand in the policy of Israel when Pekah was assassinated by Hosea. The Assyrian king, according to his account, placed Hosea on the throne and received 10 talents of gold and 1,000 talents of silver as tribute. He also made several expeditions to Babylonia, against Ukzir (743–730) and Elulæus (728–727).

Tigranes (tig-rā′nēz) I. [Gr. Τιγράνης.] Died about 55 B. C. King of Armenia, son-in-law of Mithridates the Great. He conquered Syria and part of Asia Minor, and founded Tigranocerta. Tilsit (til′sit). A town in the province of East Prussia, situated on the Memel 61 miles northeast of Konigsberg. It has varied manufactures and trade in lumber, fish, grain, hemp, flax, etc. It is famous from the peace between France on one side and Russia and Prussia on the other, agreed upon there in July, 1807. The meeting between Napoleon and Alexander took place on a raft in the river, June 25, 1807. The treaty between France and Russia was signed July 7, and that between France and Prussia July 9. According to the terms of peace, the capital duchy of Warsaw was formed out of parts of Prussia; part of Prussia was ceded to Russia, and a small portion to Saxony. Dantzic was made free; the region west of the Elbe was ceded to Napoleon; the Confederation of the Rhine and Joseph Louis, and later Bonaparte was recognized. Prussian harbors were closed to British trade; the Prussian army was reduced to 42,000; a secret conditional alliance was arranged between France and Russia; and large indemnities were to be paid by Prussia, which was reduced to a second-rate state. Population (1890), 24,747.

Tilton (til′ton), Theodore. Born at New York, Oct. 2, 1835. An American editor, poet, and lecturer. He was editor of the "Independent" and founder of the "Golden Age." He became chiefly known in connection with Henry Ward Beecher, and in 1874, which resulted in the conviction of Mr. Beecher.

Timæus (ti-mē′us), [Gr. Τίμαιος.] Lived about 400 B. C. A Greek Pythagorean philosopher of Locri in Italy: the reputed author of a philosophical work, "On the Soul of the World," probably of a later period. He appears in Plato's dialogue named from him.

Timæus. Lived about 352–256 B. C. A Greek historian of Tauromenium in Sicily. He lived in exile in Athens. He wrote a history of Italy and Sicily from the earliest times to 264 B. C., in 38 books, which has been preserved.

Timan (te-män′). A plateau or group of low mountains in the governments of Vologda and Archangel, northeastern Russia.

Timanthes (ti-man′thēz). [Gr. Τιμάνθης.] Born in the island of Cythnos (?): lived about 400 B. C. A Greek painter of Sicyon. He is known mostly as the painter of one of the great pictures of antiquity, the "Sacrifice of Iphigenia," in which Agamemnon conceals his uncontrollable grief by covering his head with his mantle. The picture was lost at sea. Pliny records it as that there is "always something more implied than expressed in his work": he suggestive of bold and general conception.

Timbuktu, or Timbuctoo (tim-buk′tö). A city of Africa, situated near the southern border of the Sahara and about 10 miles east of the Niger, about lat. 17° 45′ N. It has considerable trade in gold, gum, salt, ivory, etc., and a number of manuscripts written from the 14th century and later by Fellatah Arabs and various other peoples. It has been visited by Caillé (1828), Barth (1853), and Lenz (1880). Population, estimated, 20,000.

Times (tīmz), The London. The leading Conservative British newspaper, founded in 1785 under the title of "The London Daily Universal Register." The present name was adopted in 1788. The paper was developed under John Walter 1803–47.

Timocrate (tē-mō-krät′). A tragedy by Thomas Corneille, produced in 1656.

Timoga. See Timongaton.

Timoleon (ti-mō′le-on). [Gr. Τιμολέων.] Born at Corinth; died 337 or 336 B. C. A celebrated Greek general and statesman. He favored the death of his brother Timophanes (tyrant of Corinth), and withdrew from public life. He was then sent to aid Syracuse against Dionysius the Younger and Hiketas in 345; delivered Syracuse from Dionysius the Younger in 343; reorganized the government of the Greek power in Sicily, and defeated the Carthaginians at the crimesus in 339(?).

Timomachus (ti-mom′a-kus). [Gr. Τιμόμαχος.] Lived in the 1st century B. C. A Byzantine painter. According to Pliny, Cæsar paid a large sum for two of his pictures, Ajax and Medea. The Medea of Timomachus was not less prized in ancient epigram than the Aphrodite of Apelles. An echo of the original perhaps remains in the Medea of the Greek room in the Aix Iphigenia in Tauris and a drowning woman also dated. He seems to have shown at his best in the right manner (not after or just before the Augustan period).

Timon (ti′mon). [Gr. Τίμων.] Lived in the last part of the 5th century B. C. An Athenian misanthrope. He is the subject of a tragedy by Shakspere. See Timon of Athens.

Timone (tē-mō′nā). A comedy by Bolardo, produced before 1494: the first original Italian comedy.

Timon of Athens. A tragedy by Shakspere, which unquestionably contains much by another hand. It was produced 1606–07 and printed in 1623, and was adapted by Shadwell.

Timon of Phlius (fli′us). Lived about 280 B. C. A Greek skeptical philosopher and author. He wrote satires called Silloi, dealing with the philosophical sects, which were very influential at the dogmatic schools of philosophy. Fragments of them survive.

Timor (tē-mōr′). An island of the Malay Archipelago, about lat. 9°–10° S., long. 124°–126° E. The surface is mountainous: the southwestern part is claimed by the Netherlands, the northeastern by Portugal; the capital of the Dutch part is Kupang; that of the Portuguese, Dili. Length, about 300 miles. Area, about 12,000 square miles. Population (Dutch), 200,000; (Portuguese), about 300,000.

Timorlaut (te-mōr′lout or -lout′), Tenimber (te-nim′ber). A group of islands in the Malay Archipelago, east by north of Timor and southwest of the Aru Islands and of New Guinea: claimed by the Dutch. It comprises three large and several small islands: formerly supposed to be unpeopled. The natives (generally) are of coral reefs and low. The inhabitants are long-ly Papuas. Area, about 2,600 square miles.

Timotes (tē-mō′tās). Indians of Venezuela, in the mountain region south and southeast of Lake Maracaibo, and the adjacent plains: stock of Los Andes). The early explorers described them as agriculturists, divided into many small tribes or hordes (Timotes, Mocachachates) and having permanent the lowlands went naked and painted their bodies red; the mountain tribes wore a cotton mantle. They buried their dead in cities or in some tribes (Mocochies, etc.), in artificial vaults. The descendants are civilized, and occupy villages which take their names from the tribes. Their language is now nearly extinct, said to have had relations with the Chibcha, but this is doubtful.

Timotheus (ti-mō'the-us). [Gr. Theothes.] Died about 354 B. C. An Athenian naval commander, son of Conon. He conquered Corcyra in 375 B. C., and secured the favor of Acarnania, Cephalonia and Epirus; took Samos from the Persians in 365; and was unjustly condemned during the reward of War.

Timrod (tim'rod), Henry. Born at Charleston, S. C., Dec. 8, 1829; died at Columbia, S. C., Oct. 6, 1867. An American poet, author of Confederate war lyrics. His poems, with memoir by P. H. Hayne, were edited 1873.

Timsah (tim'sä), Lake. A small lake traversed by the Suez Canal, near Ismailia.

Timuquanan (tim-u-kwā'nan). ['Ruler' or 'master.'] A linguistic stock of North American Indians. The name was first used for a village or tribe upon St. John's River, Florida, but afterward to include the ancient tribes (now extinct) in that peninsula. When their towns were destroyed in 1706, the Indians settled on the eastern coast, upon Tomoco River and the Mosquito Lagoon. There were 60 tribes or villages attributed to this stock, the names of which have been published. Also Atimuca, Timoga.

Timur, or Timour (tē-mör'), or Timur Beg (tē-mör' bā), also Timur-Leng (tē-mör'leng) ('Timur the Lame'): corrupted to Tamerlane (tam-ėr-lān'). Born in central Asia, 1333; died 1405. A Tatar conqueror, said to have been descended from a follower of Jenghiz Khan. He became ruler about 1370 of a realm whose capital was Samarkand; conquered Persia, central Asia, and in 1398 a great part of India; waged war with the sultan Bajazet I., whom he defeated at Angora in 1402 and took prisoner; and died while preparing to invade China. He is the Tamerlaine of the plays.

Just at the moment when the sultan (Bajazet) seemed to have established the ground of his ambition, when his authority was unquestionably obeyed over the greater part of the Byzantine Empire in Europe and Asia, when the Christian states were regarding him with terror as the scourge of the world, another and a greater scourge came to quell him, and at one stroke all the vast fabric of empire which Bayezid had so triumphantly erected was shattered to the ground. This terrible conqueror was Timur the Tartar, or as we call him "Tamerlane." Timur was of Turkish race, and was born near Samarkand in 1333. He was consequently an old man of nearly seventy when he came to encounter Bayezid in 1402. It had taken him many years to establish his authority over a portion of the numerous divisions into which the Mohammedan empire of Chingiz Khan had fallen after the death of that stupendous conqueror. Timur was but a petty chief among many others: but at last he won his way, and became ruler of Samarkand and the whole province of Transoxiana, or "Beyond the River (Ma-wara-n-nahr), as the Arabs called the country north of the Oxus. Once fairly established in this province, Timur began to extend the surrounding limits, and during thirty years his ruthless armies spread over the provinces of Asia, from Delhi to Damascus, and from the Sea of Aral to the Persian Gulf. The subdivision of the Mohammedan Empire into numerous petty kingdoms rendered it powerless to meet the overwhelming hordes which Timur brought down from Central Asia. One and all, the kings and princes of Persia and Syria succumbed, and Timur carried his banners triumphantly as far as the frontier of Egypt, where the haughty Mamluk sultans still dared to defy him. He had so far left Bayezid unmolested; partly because he was too powerful to be rashly provoked, and partly because Timur respected the sultan's valorous deeds against the Christians. Timur, though a ruthless butcher, was very conscientious in matters of religion, and held that Bayezid's fighting for the Faith rightly covered a multitude of sins. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 6.

Tinchebray, or Tinchebrai (tanch-brā'), or Tenchebray, or Tenchebrai. A town in the department of Orne, Normandy, 44 miles northwest of Alençon. Here, Sept. 28, 1106, Henry I. of England defeated and captured his brother Robert, duke of Normandy. Population (1891), commune, 4,622.

Tindal (tin'dal), Matthew. Born at Beer-Ferrers, Devonshire, about 1656; died at Oxford, Aug. 16, 1733. An English deist. He studied at Lincoln College, Oxford. In 1685 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, but returned in 1688 to the Church of England. He published "An Essay of Obedience to the Supreme Powers" (1694), and "The Rights of the Christian Church asserted against the Romish and all other priests who claim an independent power over it" (1706-07). In defense of the theory of state control of the church led to the proscription of the work, Dec. 12, 1707. He continued to defend his deistic position, and in 1730 published "Christianity as old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature," a work recognized as the "Bible" of deism. The work was translated into German by J. Lorenz Schmidt in 1741, and had great influence on German theology. Tindal called himself a "Christian deist."

Tindale, William. See Tyndale.

Tintern (tin'tėrn) Abbey. A ruined medieval abbey in Monmouthshire, England, situated on the Wye 17 miles north by west of Bristol. The ivy-clad church, of the middle of the 13th century, is of the most picturesque of English ruins. The vaulting is gone, but otherwise it is well preserved. It retains most of its stonework, and has a fine west portal of two cusped arches, and a single very large window, a typical English feature, in each of the main and transept façades. The monastic buildings survive in part.

Tinto (tin'tō). Dick. The light-hearted artist who is supposed to relate Scott's tale of "The Bride of Lammermoor" to Peter Mattieson. It is also the pseudonym of Frank Booth Goodrich.

Tinto Hills (tin'tō hilz). A group of hills in Lanarkshire, Scotland, southeast of Lanark. Height, about 2,300 feet.

Tintoretto (tēn-tō-ret'tō), or Tintoret (tin'tō-ret) Jacopo Robusti: called Tintoretto from the trade of his father, a dyer). Born at Venice, Sept. 16, 1518; died there, May 31, 1594. A celebrated Venetian painter. He entered the atelier of Titian, with whom it does not appear that he stayed very long. From Titian he went to Andrea Schiavone. In 1546 he received his first important order for the decoration of the choir of Sta. Maria dell'Orto. The compositions were over 10 feet high. They brought him great reputation and a commission, and the "Miracle of St. Mark," now in the Accademia delle Arti in Venice, his most perfect and important work. The "Last Supper," in the Sacristy of San Giorgio, is more powerful and richer in technical range, but is less successful in its attainment of the finer qualities of art. In 1560 Tintoretto began to paint the Scuola di San Rocco and the doge's palace. The famous "Crucifixion" of the Scuola di San Rocco dates from this time. In 1556 he painted the ceiling of the great hall. In 1560 he seems to have taken the place of Titian as court painter to the Doge. The great conflagrations of 1574 and 1577 threw much of the work of restoration into the hands of Tintoretto. The work accomplished by him on these commissions fills the great "Paradise" (1588-90).

Tiny Tim (tī'ni tim). The little crippled son of Bob Cratchit in Dickens's "Christmas Carol."

Tioga (ti-ō'gā). A small river in northern Pennsylvania and Steuben County, New York, which unites near Corning with the Conhocton to form the Chemung.

Tionontati (tē'on-on-tä'tē). [Their own name, meaning 'people mountain stands.'] A tribe of North American Indians who formerly lived in the mountains south of Nottawasaga Bay, Ontario. They were first met in 1616 by the French, who called them Nation du Petun, or Tobacco Nation, from their large fields of tobacco. On the defeat of the Hurons in 1648, many of the fugitives took refuge with the Tionontati, and the Iroquois attacked that tribe and drove them with the Hurons to the head of Lake Superior. In turn the united remnants lived at Mackinac under the name of Wyandots. See Iroquoian.

Tipitapa (tē-pē-tä'pä). A river of Nicaragua, joining Lakes Managua and Nicaragua. Length, about 20 miles.

Tipkin (tip'kin). Biddy. A romantic character in Steele's "Tender Husband." She feels that it looks so ordinary to go out at a door to be married." Mrs. Oldfield was noted in this part.

Tippecanoe (tip'e-ka-nō'). A nickname of William Henry Harrison, from his victory near the Tippecanoe River.

Tippecanoe, Battle of the. A victory gained at Battle Ground, Tippecanoe County, Indiana, near Tippecanoe River, Nov. 7, 1811, by the Americans under General William Henry Harrison over the Indians under the "Prophet," brother of Tecumseh.

Tiresias (ti-rē'si-as). [Gr. Τειρεσίας.] In Greek legend, a blind Theban seer. He was said to have been blinded by Athene, whom he saw bathing. The goddess relented, but was unable to restore his sight, and so gave him the gift of the inner and the understanding of the voices of birds and beasts (other accounts are given in the legends). At the request of Circe, Odysseus descended into Hades to consult him.

Tirhakah (tėr'hā-kä). A king of Egypt and Ethiopia who encountered Sennacherib while he was on his expedition against Judah (Isa. xxxvii. 9; 2 Ki. xix. 9). He was defeated by Sennacherib in the battle of Eltekeh (701 B. C.), and by his son and successor Esarhaddon (680 B. C.) the entire country was conquered by the Assyrian king, the names of the cities changed, and over the twenty principalities into which the country was divided were placed vassals loyal to Assyria. His son Ituamani (Urdamanu) fell in the battle of Karbanit (about 668). The twenty kings were restored, and Necho was put at their head. Soon afterward these twenty vassals plotted into a plot with Tirhakah against Assyria. But the plot was discovered by the Assyrian garrison of Egypt, and frustrated. Tirhakah fled, and died in the place of his refuge. According to Manetho, Tirhakah (Tarkos, Tarakos) was the last of the Ethiopian kings in Egypt. The Egyptian monuments call this third and last king of the 25th "Ethiopian" dynasty Tahark or Taharka. He enlarged the temple of Amun in Thebes.

Tirlemont (tēr-lē-mōn'), Flem. Thienen (tē'nen). A town in the province of Brabant, Belgium, situated on the Geete 26 miles east of Brussels. It was taken by the Duke of Marlborough in 1706; and near it the French under Dumouriez defeated the Austrians March 16, 1793. Population, 16,157.

Tirnova (tėr'nō-vä), or Tarnovo (tär'nō-vō). A city in Bulgaria, situated on the Jantra in lat. 43° 6' N., long. 25° 36' E. It is an important strategic point on the route between the Danube and the Balkans; and was formerly the place of coronation of the Bulgarian kings. Alexander I. was chosen prince here and took the oath to the constitution in 1879. Population (1888), 11,314.

Tirso (tēr'sō). The principal river of the island of Sardinia; the ancient Thyrsus. It flows into the Gulf of Oristano near Oristano. Length, about 80 miles.

Tirso de Molina. The pseudonym of Téllez.

Tiruvalluvar (ti-rū-vaḷḷi-vär'). [Properly Tiru-vaḷḷuvar-nayanar, the sacred devotee, priest, or soothsayer of the Pariahs.] The name given to the greatest of Tamil poets, the author of the Kurral. His date is uncertain. Pope puts it between 800 and 1000 A. D. All that seems certain about the details of his life is that he lived at St. Thome or Mailapur, now a suburb of Madras; was a weaver and a Pariah; and had an intimate friend, probably a patron, called Elelacirkan, "Lion of the Surf," who was the captain of a small vessel. Kurral, the name of his work, means "anything short," then the couplet, and thence this collection of couplets. It is divided into three books, treating of Virtue, Wealth, and Pleasure, and contains 133 chapters, each containing 10 couplets, and so numbers 2,660 lines. The Venpa meter, in which it is composed, is very curious, and in fact unique. "A kaural," says Pope, "is a couplet containing a complete and striking idea expressed in a refined and intricate meter. No translation can convey an idea of its charming effect. It is truly 'an apple of gold in a network of silver.'" Every Hindu sect claims the poet, and interprets his verses strain to favor its own dogmas, the Jains especially. He was influenced by Shankara's reforms, the later developments of Jainism, and the Bhagavadgita, his philosophy seeming to be of the eclectic school represented by the last.

Tiryns (ti'rinz). [Gr. Τίρυνς.] In ancient geography, a city of Argolis, Greece, situated near the coast southeast of Argos and 3 miles north of Nauplia. It was built on a rock, and is celebrated for its antiquities, including the Cyclopean walls, and a palace (excavated by Schliemann and Dörpfeld 1884–85) of the 10th or 11th century B. C. The citadel is a famous memorial of the earliest known Greek civilization. The massive walls, built of great blocks with the interstices filled with small stones, surround the summit of an oblong hill. At one end are the well-known galleries of arcades resembling pointed arches: these were magazines for munitions and supplies. Within the walls there is an extensive prehistoric palace, with outer and inner courts, vast propylæa, a megaron, and bedchamber women's quarters, the whole corresponding with the spirit of the Homeric picture. Wall-paintings and other details of high interest were found by Schliemann. According to the legend, Hercules lived for many years at Tiryns. It was destroyed by Argos about 468 B. C.

Tischendorf (tish'en-dorf), Lobegott Friedrich Konstantin von. Born at Lengenfeld, Saxony, Jan. 18, 1815; died at Leipsic, Dec. 7, 1874. A noted Protestant biblical scholar, critic, professor at Leipsic from 1845. He was educated at Leipsic; made investigations in Paris, Holland, England, Italy, Egypt, Sinai, Palestine, and other parts of the East; and brought ancient manuscripts from the East, including the famous Sinaitic codex of the New Testament. He published a critical edition of the New Testament (1872), various codices of the Old Testament and New Testament, "Anecdota sacra et profana," "Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst?" (1865), etc.

Tishri (tish'ri). [Assyr. taskritu, explained to mean 'beginning' (i. e. of the second half-year).] The seventh month of the Hebrew year, corresponding to September–October. In Tishri fall the holy days New Year's day, Atonement day, and Tabernacles.

Tisiphone (ti-sif'ō-nē). [Gr. Τισιφόνη.] In Greek mythology, one of the Eumenides (which see).

Tissaphernes (tis-a-fēr'nēz). [Gr. Τισσαφέρνης.] Executed about 395 B. C. A Persian satrap. He became satrap in Asia Minor 414 B. C.; carried on war against the Athenians; was hostile to Cyrus the Younger, and discovered and disclosed the latter's plans to Artaxerxes II.; took part in the battle of Cunaxa 401 B. C.; accompanied the Ten Thousand on part of their return journey, but later deserted them; was appointed chief ruler in western Asia by Artaxerxes; was defeated by Agesilaus in 396; and was put to death through the influence of Parysatis.

He was one of the founders of the Liberal party in 1875, and was minister of the interior and premier of Hungary 1875–90.

Titan (tī'tan). [Gr. Τιτάν.] 1. See Titans.—2. The sun personified, the name Titan being at times substituted by the Latin poets for Helios as god of the sun.—3. The sixth in order of the eight satellites of the planet Saturn, and the largest, appearing as a star of the fifth magnitude: discovered by Huygens March 25, 1655. See Saturn.

Titan. One of the principal romances of Jean Paul Richter, published in 1803.

Titania (ti-tā'ni-ä). A fairy queen in Shakspere's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Shakspere is said to be the first to give this name to the queen of the fairies.

Titania. The third satellite of Uranus, discovered by Lassell in 1847.

Titans (tī'tanz). [Gr. Τιτᾶνες, from Τιτάν, father, children of Titan.] In Greek mythology, a race of primordial deities, children of Uranus and Gæa (Heaven and Earth). In the oldest accounts they were six sons (Cœus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, and Cronus) and six female (Theia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phœbe, and Tethys). They were imprisoned by their father Uranus from the birth, but, after a successful uprising led by Cronus, were delivered by Zeus, son of Cronus, compelled him to disgorge his elder brothers and sisters whom he had swallowed at their birth, and driven from heaven. They were then imprisoned in or into Tartarus, under guard of the hundred-armed giants. In the later legends, Titan, the father of the Titans, yielded the sway over the sun to his younger brother Cronus, but regained it, and was finally overcome by the Olympian gods of Zeus (Jupiter), son of Cronus (Saturn), who then became the supreme god. The Titans in their wars are said to have piled mountains upon mountains to reach heaven, and they were taken as the types of lawlessness, gigantic size, and enormous strength.

Tithonus (ti-thō'nus). [Gr. Τιθωνός.] In Greek mythology, a son (or brother) of Laomedon, beloved by Eos. He received from the gods the gift of immortality, but not of eternal youth, and in his old age, withered away and was metamorphosed into a grasshopper.

Titian (tish'an), It. Tiziano Vecelli (tēt-sē-ä'nō vā-chel'lē or Vecellio (vā-chel'lē-ō); surnamed Da Cadore, and Il Divino ("The Divine"). Born at Pieve di Cadore, Friuli, 1477; died at Venice, Aug. 27, 1576. A celebrated Venetian painter. His first undoubted paintings at his native place date from 10 years of age went to Venice and was put to study with Giovanni Bellini. He does not seem to have been influenced by any of the Venetian painters of 1507–10, but worked as colleague with Giorgione in the decoration of the exterior of the Fondaco de Tedeschi at Venice; these frescoes are destroyed. In 1511 Titian was at work for the school of Padua with Campagnola, who was his assistant. He returned to Venice in 1512, and in 1513 sought to obtain an order for a battle-piece for the council-hall, and applied for the first vacancy as broker at the Fondaco, a privilege already accorded to Bellini and Carpaccio. About this time he declined an invitation to work at Rome, and painted the famous "Assumption" for his successor as broker at the Fondaco and as portrait-painter to the doges. In 1517 he went to Ferrara at the invitation of Alphonso d'Este, and painted several pictures, some of which were now in Europe and others in private collections. From this time he was occupied with commissions from various royal and private clients until 1523, when he returned to Venice to paint the portrait of the new doge Andrea Gritti, and the fresco over the landing of the doges' palace. '88, Christopher carrying the Christ-child," and "Madonna and Saints." About this time he married, and in 1530 was left a widower with three children. In 1532 Titian was called to Bologna by Charles V., who had come to meet the Pope. He became painter to the emperor, and enjoyed his friendship. This period lasted him in 1546 to Rome, where he met Michelangelo and became acquainted with the work of Raphael and the Greeks. He was at this time 68 years old. In 1547 he was summoned to Augsburg by the emperor, and there he painted many portraits. His court life was brilliant and profitable. In 1550 he returned to Venice, and in 1567 returned to Augsburg. His life from this time forward is a succession of honors and triumphs. He succeeded to the favor of Philip on the death of Charles V., and painted for him the principal paintings are many representations of the Magdalen, Venus, Danaë, the Madonna, the Holy Family, etc.: "Sacred and Profane Love" (London); "Bacchanalian Revel" (London, Prado); "Europa" (Madrid); "Entombment of Christ" (Louvre); "Tribute Money" (Dresden); "Martyrdom of St. Laurence"; "St. Peter Martyr," "Last Supper," "Christ Crowned with Thorns" (Louvre); "Bella della Casa"; "Titian's Mistress" (Palazzo Pitti, Florence); and another at The Hermitage, St. Petersburg; "Venus of the Tribune" (Paris); "Holy Family" (Hermitage, Court); "Knight of Malta" (Madrid); "Titian and his Mistress" (Louvre), etc.

Titicaca (tē-tē-kä'kä). An island in Lake Titicaca, near the S. peninsula of Copacabana. It was a sacred place of the Incas, the birthplace of the sun according to one of their legends, and by some said to be the place whence Manco Capac and his wife issued to found the empire of Cuzco. Ruins of a temple of the sun, a palace, convent, etc., still exist on it. The lake itself probably took its name from this island.

Titicaca (tē-tē-kä'kä). Lake. The largest and most important inland lake of South America, situated in a high basin between two ranges of the Andes, on the confines of Peru and Bolivia, 12,545 feet above the sea. It is irregular in form, and almost cut in two by the Peninsula of Copacabana. Near the eastern side it attains a depth of over 700 feet, but along the western and southern sides there are extensive shallows and marshes. The outlet is the Desaguadero, at the southern end. There are many small islands, some of these, as well as the Peninsula of Copacabana and many parts of the shore, have interesting ruins of the Incaic and pre-Incaic periods. The most celebrated of the latter are at Tiahuanaco (which see). The lake is surrounded with many lofty and rugged mountains. The Indians still navigate Lake Titicaca on rafts made of rushes, but sailing vessels have been placed on it. Lines of steamers have also begun to ply on the lake. The shore line is 680 miles. Average width, about 35 miles. Area, 3,200 square miles. Elevation above sea-level, 12,846 feet. Length, 120 miles. Average depth, 600 feet. Greatest depth, 1,000 feet. Volume of water, 1,920 cubic miles. Area of drainage basin, 35,000 square miles. Evaporation is so great that the water is just fresh enough to drink. The northern part of the basin, and sometimes the whole of it, is called the Collao.

Tlaxcalans (tläs'kä-lanz), or Tlaxcaltecs (tläs-käl-teks'). A tribe of Mexican Indians, of the Nahuatlecan stock, who occupied the territory now included in the state of Tlaxcala, to the east of the valley of Mexico. They were less warlike than the Aztecs; but they were brave warriors and had repeatedly defeated the Aztec armies, retaining their independence. They had elective chiefs; but the main governing power was the tribal council, called a senate by Spanish historians. Their principal pueblo was on or near the site now occupied by the city of Tlaxcala. Cortés, in his first march to Mexico, took the native through Tlaxcalan territory, and they resisted him in several fierce battles (Sept. 1519). Having been defeated, they made terms with the Spaniards, joined Cortés with a large force of warriors, and took a prominent part in the siege and capture of Mexico. The modern Indian population of Tlaxcala is mainly descended from this tribe. See also Nahuas, Tlaxcaltecas.

Tocqueville (tok'vil; F. pron. tok-vēl'). Alexis Charles Henri Clerel de. Born at Paris, July 29, 1805; died at Cannes, April 16, 1859. A celebrated French statesman and writer. His studies, begun at Metz, were completed by a course in law at Paris. He took his final degree in 1826, and spent then a year or more traveling in Italy and Sicily. On his return to France he occupied a post in the law court of Versailles. But his mind was not altogether suited to his tastes, and April 2, 1831, he left France for the United States, whither he was sent by his government to investigate the penitentiary system. He did not limit himself, however, to this special field, but extended his observations also to the social and political institutions and economy of the country. The results were soon published in France, together with his friend and traveling companion, M. de Beaumont, the result of their official investigations, under the title "Du système pénitentiaire aux Etats-Unis et de son application en France." This important work attracted much attention, and was crowned by the French Academy. On the fall of Louis Philippe he held a prominent position while on his visit to the United States, he wrote his masterpiece, "Democratie en Amérique" (1835–40). Its success secured his admission to the French Academy (Dec. 23, 1841). After several years of public life (1839–51), he retired in order to devote his entire time to travel and writing. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote a number of pamphlets on various subjects, also an "Histoire philosophique du regne de Louis XV." (1846), and the first volume of the work left unfinished at his death, "Etat social et politique de la France" was translated into English by John Stuart Mill, and published in the April number of the "Westminster Review." De Tocqueville's complete works were edited by his friend M. de Beaumont 1860–65.

2. The capital of the province of Toledo, situated on the Tagus in lat. 39° 51′ N., long. 4° 1′ W.: the ancient Toletum. It is picturesquely situated on hills; is the seat of an archbishop, primate of Spain; was long noted for manufactures, and is still famous for its swords; and has a trade in coal, iron, lumber, and grain. It formerly contained a university. The cathedral, the metropolitan church of Spain, was commenced in 1227, and is essentially of the 13th century, though it was not finished until 1492. Like most Spanish churches, it is not effective without. The five-aisled interior, though not lofty, is very impressive and picturesque: it has much good glass, and is a museum of sculpture and rich old church furniture. The choir-stalls are carved with the long series of victories of Ferdinand and Isabella over the Moors. The cloisters are large, with fine simple tracery and vaulting. The city contains many other churches and religious houses, and many specimens of Moorish architecture. The Alcazar is a combined palace and citadel rebuilt and decorated by Charles V., but greatly damaged by fire in 1886. The patio, or inner court, is a fine example of Renaissance arcading. The bridges of Alcantara and San Martin, over the Tagus, are both essentially of the 13th century, narrow, very lofty, and with an enormous central arch. The first has only one side arch, and a battlemented tower at the inner end and a simple gate at the outer; the second has four side arches, and a fortified tower at each end. The city was the ancient capital of the Carpetani, and was conquered by the Romans about 193 B. C. It was the capital of the West-Gothic realm; has been the seat of many councils; was the second city in the country under the Moorish rule; was taken by Alfonso VI. of Castile and Leon in 1085; was defended against Moorish attacks in the 12th century; and was the capital of Castile until supperceded by Madrid in the 16th century. Tolstoi, Count Lyeff or Lyoff (or, e. Leo) Nikolaievich. Born in the government of Tula, Russia, Aug. 28, 1828 (O. S.). A Russian novelist, social reformer, and religious mystic. He was educated at the University of Kazan, and served in the army in the Caucasus and in the Crimean war, being appointed division commander in May, 1855. He took part in the battle of the Tchernaya, was in the storming of Sebastopol, and after it was sent as a special courier to St. Petersburg. He retired at the end of the campaign. After the liberation of the serfs he lived on his estates, working with and relieving the peasants, and also devoting himself to study. The stories regarding his life in the mines banished the perpetrators of such crimes to the north. His chief novels are "War and Peace" (1865–69; a picture of Russian society 1805–15) and "Anna Karenina" (1875–78). Among his shorter works are "Sevastopol" (1853–55), "The Cossacks" (composed while in the army), "Ivan Ilyitch" (1886), "Two Pilgrims," "Childhood, Boyhood and Youth," "My Religion" (1885), "My Confession," "A Commentary on the Gospel," "A Life," "The Kreutzer sonata" (1890), and "War" (1892).

Toltecs (tol'teks or tōl-tāks'). A traditional or perhaps mythical race of Indians, said to have occupied the Mexican plateau during several centuries previous to the advent of the Aztecs. According to the story, they came from Huehuetlapallan, somewhere in the north, and after various migrations and temporary settlements arrived at Tollan (supposed to be Tula in Hidalgo), where they settled in 604 (or 674?), and a list is given of 9 or 11 "kings" who ruled them. The legends also connect them with the ruins at Teotihuacan. The pyramids of Cholula, etc.; and the prophet or hero Quetzalcohuatl is said to have appeared in their midst, making his final departure from Tlapallan, an unknown locality, but supposed to be near the sea-coast. About 1052 the Toltec power was overthrown, and the nation journeyed southward and disappeared; but many have supposed that the Maya empire, which came into prominence about that time, originated in Tollan. The vagueness and confusion which characterize all accounts of the Toltecs have given rise to many and widely diverse theories about them. Some ethnologists—notably Dr. Brinton—deny that they ever had any real existence, except, perhaps, in a few rude and small gens of the Aztecs; others believe that they formed a powerful kingdom which left profound traces on the later civilizations.

All that we can gather about them with safety is that they were a sedentary Indian stock which at some remote time settled in portions of central Mexico, as for instance at Tula, Tullantzinco, Teotihuacan, and perhaps Cholula. Nothing is known of their language, and the fact must not be overlooked that the so-called Toltec names mentioned in the chronicles are in the Nahuatl idiom.

Bandelier, An Archæological Tour in Mexico, p. 191.

Torcello (tor-chel'lō). A small island 6 miles northeast of Venice, of importance in the 10th and 11th centuries. It contains an ancient Byzantine cathedral of Santa Maria, and a church of Santa Fosca. The former was rebuilt in the 11th century, but preserves the early basilican plan. The south windows of the choir have some stained glass of the 12th century. Nave and aisles end in apses: that of the nave has a primitive presbyterium of three steps at the back, forming seats for the clergy, with the raised episcopal throne in the middle. The chief apse and other portions of the interior are covered with curious and beautiful mosaics; and the pavement and many details of furniture and decoration are of the highest interest. Santa Fosca is a remarkable church, probably of the 12th century, in plan a Greek cross 46 by 42 feet, originally the baptistery of the cathedral. It has porches of stilted arches on three sides, three apses on the east, and was originally domed at the crossing. The graceful interior is surrounded by 12 handsome columns from earlier churches.

Tordesilhas (tôr-da-sēl'yäs), Sp. Tordesillas (tôr-da-sēl'yäs), Convention of. A treaty between Spain and Portugal, signed at Tordesilhas June 7, 1494, regulating their rights of discovery and conquest. The Pope, by his celebrated bull of May 3, 1493, had drawn a meridian "100 leagues west of the Azores and Cape Verd Islands," giving to Spain the right of conquest to the west of it, and to Portugal the same right on the east. The convention of Tordesilhas removed this line to a meridian 370 leagues west of the Cape Verd Islands. At that time the continental character of America was unknown, and the powers supposed that they were dividing "the Indies," or Asia; but apparently it never occurred to them that, in pushing their conquests, they would eventually meet on the same meridian, but on the opposite side of the world. Unfortunately the meridian was not definitely fixed — first, because it was reckoned from an archipelago, and not from one island or point; and second, because the term "league" admitted of several different meanings. The Brazilian coast, discovered soon after, was clearly to the east of the Tordesilhas line, and it was accordingly settled by the Portuguese; but the line passed near the mouths of the two great rivers Plata and Amazon, and in the uncertainty as to its position disputes arose in those regions which have come down to the present day. Eventually, and partly because of the uncertainty, the Portuguese pushed their conquests far westward. In the course of time the two powers met in the East Indies, and here the field of dispute was broader, owing to the defective methods of determining longitude which were then in vogue. The Philippine Islands, discovered by Magellan, were claimed and held by Spain as lying within her hemisphere; but in fact they were in the hemisphere which had been assigned to Portugal.

In 1791, after protecting the flight of his master, he joined Jean François, with whom he subsequently fought for the royalist faction, at that time united with the Spanish colonists. In 1794, with a large force of blacks, he deserted to the French republicans, thus turning the scale in their favor and acquiring unbounded influence for himself. He was made deputy governor and commander-in-chief; and eventually the French commissioners, who were supposed to rule the island, were left with only nominal power. When the British under General Maitland occupied the island in 1798, they refused to treat with Commissioner Hédouville, but surrendered the posts which they had held to Toussaint as the real ruler. Soon after an insurrection, headed by Toussaint, drove Hédouville from the island: he delegated his powers to the mulatto general Rigaud, but in 1799 Rigaud was defeated by Toussaint, who became undisputed master of the western part of the island. He issued a general amnesty, protected the whites, and put the blacks at work on their old plantations under a compulsory system which, however, secured them a part of the profits. In 1801 he occupied the eastern part of the island, which had been ceded to France. Finally he threw off all pretense of subjection to France, promulgating a constitution which made him president for life, with power of nominating his successor (July, 1801). Bonaparte therupon sent a general order with a formidable force to subdue the island (see Leclerc). After a series of bloody conflicts Toussaint capitulated, and was pardoned (May 1, 1802). Two months after he was arrested on a charge of conspiracy and sent to France, where he remained a prisoner until his death.

Tower Hamlets. A parliamentary borough in London, situated east of the City and north of the Thames. It returns six members to Parliament.

Tower Hill. A hill in London, near the Tower, formerly the scene of execution of political offenders.

Tower of London. The ancient palace-citadel of London. It is situated on the Thames at the southeast angle of the old walled city of London. The Roman wall ran through the site. It consists of a large and irregular agglomeration of buildings of different periods, inclosed within battlemented and moated walls. While a stronghold of some kind existed earlier on the site, the history of the Tower begins with William the Conqueror. The chief buildings are the work of Norman kings and Henry III. No important additions were made after Edward I. When it ceased to be a royal residence it became famous as a state prison, and is now a national arsenal. The royal mint was located there in the middle ages. The Tower has four gates—the Iron, Water, and Traitors' Gates on the side toward the Thames, and the Lions' Gate at the southwest angle. In the middle of the inclosure rises the square and lofty White Tower, the keep of the medieval fortress. It is characterized by its four tall angle-turrets with modern crowning. In the White Tower is the venerable Chapel of St. John, with heavy cylindrical pillars, round arches, and rude capitals; it is unsurpassed as an example of the earliest type of Norman architecture. In the halls above is shown an admirable collection of medieval arms and armor. The buildings of the inner inclosure include 12 towers, with many of which are associated memories of historic captives, executions, and crimes. In the Record or Wakefield Tower are kept the crown jewels of England. In the Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula, in the northwest angle, and the little cemetery adjoining, are buried most of the celebrated persons who suffered death within the Tower precincts or on Tower Hill. The buildings are for the most part severely plain, in rough masonry of small stones, their great interest lying almost wholly in their manifold associations.

Tower of the Winds. The horologium or water-clock erected by the Syrian Andronicus Cyrrhestes, at Athens, in the 1st century B. C. It is octagonal in plan, 26 feet in diameter, and 42 high. Toward the top of each face is sculptured the figure of a Wind with appropriate attributes. The structure was surmounted by a bronze Triton which served as a weathervane.

Tract No. 90. See Tracts for the Times.

Tracts for the Times, or Oxford Tracts. A series of 90 pamphlets, published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841, the doctrines of which formed the basis of the Tractarian movement. The movement began as a counter-movement to the liberalizing tendency in ecclesiastism and the rationalizing tendency in theology, and was in its first inception an endeavor to bring the church back to the principles of primitive and patristic Christianity. Its fundamental principles were that the Christian religion involves certain well-defined theological dogmas and a visible church with sacraments and rites and definite religious teaching on the foundation of dogma, and that this visible church is based upon and perpetuates the doctrine of episcopal succession from the apostles, and includes the Anglican church. The tracts consisted of extracts from the High-church divines of the 17th century and the church fathers, with contributions by Newman, Pusey, Pusey, and Isaac Williams. In the last of the series, Tract No. 90, Dr. (afterward Cardinal) Newman took the ground that the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England are here put susceptible of an interpretation not inconsistent with the doctrines of the Council of Trent. This tract was condemned by a majority of bishops and heads of colleges, and a part of the Tractarians (among them Newman in 1845) entered the church of Rome, others remaining with Dr. Pusey and John Keble in the Church of England, and maintaining the privileges and sacramental efficacy and apostolic authority within that communion.

Trappists (trap'ists). [From F. Trappiste: so called from the abbey of La Trappe in France.] A monastic body, a branch of the Cistercian order. It is named from the village of Soligny-la-Trappe, in the department of Orne, France, where the abbey of La Trappe was founded in 1140 by Rotrou, count of Perche. The abbey fell into decay, and was governed for many years by titular or commendatory abbots. De Rancé (1626–1700), who had been commendatory abbot of La Trappe from his boyhood, became its actual abbot in 1664, and thoroughly reformed and organized the order. The rules of the order are noted for their extreme austerity, and include extended fasts, severe manual labor, almost perpetual silence, abstinence from flesh, fish, etc., and rigorous asceticism in general. The order was repressed in France during the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods. There are branch monasteries in France, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy, etc., and two in the United States—abbeys of Gethsemane (Kentucky) and of New Melleray (Iowa). There is also an establishment of Trappistines.

Treasury of Atreus. See the extract.

> The most ancient remains of buildings in Greece are of Cyclopean, or, as we have it, of Pelasgic origin; and the most famous of these Cyclopean works are two subterraneous structures known as the Treasury of Atreus and the Treasury of Minyas—the former at Mycenæ in Argolis, the latter at Orchomenos in Bœotia. Both are built after the one plan, being huge dome-shaped constructions formed of horizontal layers of dressed stones, each layer projecting over the one next below, till the top was closed by a single block. The whole was then covered in with earth and so buried.

Trebizond, or Trapezunt (trap-e-zönt'). A seaport, capital of the vilayet of Trebizond, on the Black Sea in lat. 41° 1′ N., long. 39° 46′ E. : the ancient Trapezus. It is picturesquely situated on a table-land between two deep ravines, and is defended by a citadel and walls. Smyrna it is the chief commercial city in Asia Minor; and it is a center of transit trade between Europe and Armenia, Persia, and central Asia. It is the terminus of steamship lines (Austro-Hungarian, Lloyd's, Messageries Maritimes, etc.). It was the Greek colony of Sinope; was a resting-place in the retreat of the Ten Thousand; was an important city about the time of Hadrian; and became the center of the empire of Trebizond. It was captured by the sultan Mohammed II. in 1461. Population, about 40,000.

> Trapezus was one of the Arcadian towns doomed to be swallowed up in Megalopolis's ambition. Vol. i., sect. 9, 3). Its inhabitants, however, refused to remove, and so incurred the anger of the other Arcadians. The greater number were slain, and the rest removed to Trapezus on the Euxine (now Trebizond), which looked upon the Arcadian Trapezus as its mother city (Pausan. ut supra, 4). Other writers make the Pontic Trapezus a Sinopian settlement.

Treveri (trev'e-ri), or Treviri. In ancient history, a Celtic (or Germanic ?) people in eastern Gaul, who dwelt near the Moselle. Their chief town was Treves (which was named from them).

But, if we admit the witness of Jerome as to the Celtic speech of the Treveri, it follows that we must admit their Celtic descent. During the times between Cæsar's day and Jerome's, they must have changed their speech either for German or Gaulish for Latin; they were not at all likely to exchange German for Gaulish. In the face of such witness as this, it is hardly safe for German writers to assume, as they sometimes do, without doubt or qualification, that the Treveri were a German people.

Treves (trēvz), F. Trèves (trāv), G. Trier (trēr). [L. Augusta Treverorum, imperial city of the Treveri; Mk. Treviris.] A city in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Moselle in lat. 49° 45′ N., long. 6° 38′ E. It contains more Roman antiquities than any other city in northern Europe (see below). Its cathedral is one of the oldest of German churches, occupying the site of a 4th-century basilica built by Valentinian I., some portions of which are incorporated in the existing structure. In the 11th century an addition was made in front of the west end, with an apse, and the eastern apse was built a century later. The vaulting is of the 13th century. The different styles of masonry and ornament are plainly distinguishable on the exterior. The interior possesses the Romanesque pulpit, choir-screen, and high altar, and beautiful monuments. It contains the famous seamless or "Holy Coat" said to have been worn by Jesus Christ. According to the legend, the empress Helena brought it to Treves in 1106. About 1512 it became a fruitful source of revenue. Its last exhibitions were in 1844 and 1891, when it attracted over a million and a half pilgrims. Treves contains a Roman basilica, assigned to the reign of Constantine; one of the special class of Roman monuments intended for the administration of justice and the conveyance of grain. The monument has been put to various uses since the Roman day, and is now a Protestant church. It is built entirely of brick, in the form of a rectangle, with a lofty nave semicircular apse at the north end. The Porta Nigra is another memorial of the old Roman city, consisting of a fortified gate flanked by two towers. It is assigned to the 4th century, and has its name from the black hue acquired by its masonry from age. It has two gateways, 23 feet high, and consists of three stories, its measures 115 by 29 feet, and the towers are 95 feet high. There is a Roman amphitheater, assigned to the time of Trajan or Hadrian, and in excellent preservation. On one side the structure is supported against a side hill; on the other it is built up architecturally. At the north and south ends there are triple gateways, the central passage leading to the arena, and those at the sides giving access to the subterranea. There are two other entrances for spectators on the west side. The axes of the elliptical plan are 228 and 159 feet, and the auditorium could receive about 30,000 people. There are also Roman baths, after those of Badenweiler the best-preserved structure of this class north of Italy, dating from the 4th century A. D., and lately excavated. The length of the chief building is 620 feet; the disposition of the cold bath (frigidarium), warm bath (tepidarium), hot-air bath (caldarium), heating devices (hypocaustum), etc., is still clear. Treves, founded, perhaps by the emperor Claudius, was one of the most important provincial cities under the Roman Empire, of which it was the western capital. It was taken by the Franks about 464; had great importance in the middle ages as the capital of the archbishopric of Treves; passed to France in 1794, and became the capital of the department of Sarre; and passed to Prussia in 1814. Population (1890), 36,106.

Treves, F. Trèves, G. Trier, Electorate of. An electorate and archbishopric of the old German Empire. It lay chiefly west of the Rhine, but a part by east, opposite Coblenz. It is said to have been made a bishopric in the 1st century, and became an archbishopric in the 9th century. It was confirmed as an electorate in 1356. The part on the left of the Rhine was annexed by France in 1795. It was secularized in 1801, and the part east of the Rhine was given to Nassau. Nearly all of the electorate was added to Prussia 1814–15.

Trimurti (tri-mör'ti). [In Skt., 'having three forms,' and then at the beginning of a compound a collective designation of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva.] The Hindu triad, consisting of these gods, associated in a threefold impersonation of the Supreme Spirit. Brahma is the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Shiva the destroyer. Brahma should strictly be the first of three equal persons, but ordinarily either Shiva or Vishnu is identified with the Supreme Being, and the other two, practically though not theoretically, are reduced to a subordinate part. Although there are traces of a triadic principle in the earlier literature, as in the triad of Agni, Vayu or Indra, and Surya, the doctrine of the Trimurti is a development of the later Puranic theology, and rather a philosophical conception than an important article of popular belief. Its significance has been much exaggerated. These gods are creations of the Supreme Spirit, rather than the supreme Spirit himself. They are composed of material particles, and are subject to destruction and reabsorption. The points of difference from are quite as noticeable as the points of resemblance to the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.

Trinacria (tri-nā'kri-ä). [Gr. Τρινακρία.] An old name of Sicily, from the three promontories Pachynum, Pelorum, and Lilybæum. See the extract.

> The Egyptians are said to have signified their divine Triad by a simple triangle, which sometimes appears upon Greek monuments; but the most ancient form of this more concise and comprehensive symbol appears to be that of the three lines, or three human legs, springing from a central disk or circle, which has been called a Trinacria, and supposed to allude to the island of Sicily. But which is of earlier origin — its earliest appearance being upon the very ancient coins of Aspendus in Pamphylia, sometimes alone in the square incuse, and sometimes upon the body of the eagle or the back of the lion.

Trinidad (trin-i-dad'; Sp. pron. trē-nē-thäth'). [Sp., 'Trinity.' Columbus is said to have given the name to the island on account of three prominent peaks near the shore where he first saw it.] An island of the British West Indies, forming with Tobago a crown colony, situated northeast of Venezuela, near the coast, and northwest of the northern mouths of the Orinoco. Capital, Port of Spain. The surface is varied, portions being mountainous. The chief exports are sugar, cocoa, molasses, coffee, and asphalt (from the celebrated pitch lake of La Brea). It was discovered by Columbus in 1498; and was taken by the British from the Spanish in 1797. Length, about 50 miles. Area, 1,754 square miles. Population (1891), 209,028.

Trinidad. A small island belonging to Great Britain, situated in the South Atlantic in lat. 20° 32′ S., long. 29° 20′ W.

Trinidad. The capital of Las Animas County, Colorado, situated on Las Animas River, in lat. 37° 10′ N. Population (1890), 5,523.

Trinidad. A seaport on the southern coast of Cuba, about long. 80° W. Population (with the district, 1887), 29,448.

Trinidad. A town of Bolivia, capital of the department of Beni, near the river Mamoré. It was the most celebrated of the Jesuit mission towns of the Madeira valley, but is now a mere village. Population, about 2,000.

Trinity (trin'i-ti). A small seaport on the eastern coast of Newfoundland, 57 miles northnorthwest of St. John's.

Trinity Bay. A large bay on the eastern side of Newfoundland, deeply indenting the coast, and nearly cutting off the peninsula of Avalon.

Trinity Church. 1. A notable church (Episcopalian) at Boston, Massachusetts, designed by H. H. Richardson, founded in 1873, and consecrated in 1877. The building is cruciform, 160 by 120 feet, in the Romanesque style of Auvergne, the masonry exhibiting inlaid patterns in stone of different colors. The transepts have triple windows, and the front, with its graceful arcaded loggia, is flanked by towers. The chief feature of the church is the imposing central tower, which has square openings below and arcades above, with cylindrical turrets at the angles, and a pyramidal tiled roof 211 feet high, broken by picturesque dormers. The interior is ornamented with mural paintings by John La Farge and other artists.

2. One of the oldest religious foundations (Episcopalian) in New York city, though the present building dates only from 1846. It is an example in brown stone of the English Perpendicular style, with square chevet, without transepts, and with an effective tower and spire, 284 feet high, at the east end, which is the front. The richly sculptured reredos and the bronze doors are artistically notable.

Trinity College. The largest college of Cambridge University, England, founded by Henry VIII. in 1546 by the union of several older foundations. The beautiful gateway on the street is mainly of the time of Henry VIII. The great court, 340 by 280 feet, is bounded on the north by the chapel and on the west by the hall. The chapel is of the Tudor period, with fine wood-carving and portrait-sculptures. The cloister court is arcaded on three sides, and on the fourth is bounded by the handsome classical library built by Wren. There are several other comparatively modern courts.

Trinity College. A college of Oxford University, founded by Sir Thomas Pope in 1554 upon the site of an old college of the priors of Durham which had been founded in 1286. The Renaissance chapel, built in 1694, has a plain exterior with large round-arched windows, and possesses a fine altarpiece and a beautiful carved screen.

Trinity College, or The University of Dublin. The leading educational institution in Ireland, founded by Queen Elizabeth in 1591. The chief front, toward College Green, is ornamented with Corinthian columns and pilasters, and pediments. The extensive buildings include several quadrangles or "squares." The chapel has a Corinthian portico; the decorations of the library are also Corinthian. The campanile, which stands alone, is a circular domed Corinthian belvedere, surmounted by a lantern, and resting on a rusticated basement pierced by arches.

Trinity College. An institution of learning at Hartford, Connecticut. It was opened in 1824, and was known as Washington College until 1845. It is under Episcopal control. It had 116 students in 1893, and a library of 35,000 volumes.

Trinity Hall. A college of Cambridge University, England, founded in 1350, and occupied chiefly by students of law.

Trinity House, Corporation of. An English corporation, first chartered in 1514, charged with various matters, especially with erecting lighthouses, etc.

Trinity River. 1. A tributary of the Klamath River in northwestern California. Length, over 100 miles.—2. A river in Texas, formed by the union of the West Fork and Elm Fork, and flowing into Galveston Bay. Length, over 500 miles; navigable about half its length.

Trinkitat (tring-ki-tät'). A port on the Red Sea, about 38 miles southeast of Tokar: an important strategic point in the Sudanese campaign of 1884.

Trinkitat, Battle of. See Tokar.

Trinobantes (trin-ō-ban'tēz). See the extract.

> The Trinobantes, another Belgian tribe, had settled in such parts of the modern Middlesex and Essex as were not covered by the oak forest or overflowed by the sea. Their western boundary may be fixed in the Valley of the Lea and along the edge of the "Forest of Middlesex," which once spread northwards from the swamp at Finsbury and covered the Weald of Essex. Their northern limit was fixed at the Valley of the Stour, a flat and marshy tract which is thought to have been covered at that time by the sea for a distance of many miles above the termination of the modern estuary. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 105.

Trinummus (tri-num'us). A comedy by Plautus.

Triomphe, Arc de. See Arc de Triomphe.

Tripartite Chronicle. A Latin historical poem by Gower.

Tripitaka (tri-pi'ta-ka). [In Pali Tipitaka, the Three Baskets.] A collective name for the three classes into which the sacred writings of the Southern Buddhists are divided, viz. the Sutrapitaka (Pali Sutlapitaka), 'Aphorisms,' 'Discourses for the Laity'; Vinayapitaka, 'Discipline for the Order'; and Abhidharmapitaka (Pali Abhidhammapitaka), 'Metaphysics.' The term "basket" was applied to these divisions because the palm-leaves on which they were written were kept in baskets. A list in detail of the several treatises included in each of these divisions may be found in Rhys Davids's "Buddhism" (London, 1886), pp. 18-21. Discussing the question of their enormous mass, Davids finds that, exclusive of the very frequent repetitions, they contain rather less than twice as many words as the Bible, and that a translation of them into English would be about four times as long.

Triple Alliance. 1. A league between England, Sweden, and the Netherlands, formed in 1668, and designed to check the French aggressions.—2. A league between France, Great Britain, and the Netherlands, formed in 1717, and directed chiefly against Spain. After the accession to it of Austria in 1718, it was known as the Quadruple Alliance.—3. An alliance between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy, formed in 1883, and designed to check Russia and also France. It is chiefly the creation of Prince Bismarck. By its provisions the three powers are bound to support one another in certain contingencies. Its influence succeeded to that of the League of the Three Emperors (the German, Austrian, and Russian), which was also largely the creation of Bismarck.

Triple Alliance, War of the, or Paraguayan War. The war waged, 1865–70, between Paraguay on one side and Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay on the other. Lopez of Brazil had a short war with Uruguay which ended in the downfall of the government of the latter country, Flores assuming the presidency. Lopez, president of Paraguay, protested against the influence of Brazil in the affairs of Uruguay, and commenced the war by seizing a Brazilian passenger steamer at Asuncion (Nov., 1864) and invading Matto Grosso (Dec., 1864–Jan., 1865). Early in 1865 he sent a force across Argentine territory against the Brazilian province of Rio Grande do Sul; subsequently he seized Argentine merchantmen, and on April 14, 1865, occupied Corrientes, taking the two Argentine war vessels. On June 11 the Paraguayan flotilla was nearly annihilated in a combat with the Brazilian squadron at Riachuelo, below Corrientes. The Argentine Republic declared war on Paraguay April 6; and on May 1 the triple offensive and defensive alliance between Brazil, the Argentine, and Uruguay was signed at Buenos Ayres. The Emperor of Brazil and Presidents Mitre and Flores took personal part in the campaign in Rio Grande do Sul; the Paraguayans who had invaded that province were besieged in Uruguayana, and surrendered (6,000 men) Sept. 18, 1865. On Oct. 25 Corrientes was occupied by the allies, who, after some fighting, crossed the Parana into Paraguay, April, 1866. The most important of the subsequent operations were near the river Paraguay, and especially at Humaitá and Curupaity, where Lopez had strong fortifications. The principal battles were: Paraguayan defeat at Estero Bellaco (May 2, 1865) and Tuyuty (May 24); Boqueron taken, July 16; allies repulsed at Sauce, July 18; Curuzu bombarded, Sept. 1, taken by assault Sept. 3 (the Brazilian ironclad Rio de Janeiro was sunk by a torpedo Sept. 2); allies repulsed at Curupaity, Sept. 22; second battle of Tuyuty, Nov. 3, 1867; passage of Humaitá by the allied fleet, Feb. 19, 1868; Israelitana repulsed at Humaitá, Feb. 16; Paraguayans abandoned Humaitá, July 25; repulsed at Pikisiry, Sept. 23; battles near Villeta, Dec. 6 and 11; Villeta occupied by the allies, Dec. 11; battles on Dec. 21, 22, and 27, ending in the surrender of Angostura Dec. 30; allies entered Asuncion, Jan. 1, 1869. Subsequently there were unimportant combats, usually adverse to the Paraguayans. Lopez was forced into the northern part of Paraguay, and was defeated and killed at the Aquidaban. A small Brazilian army had operated in Matto Grosso, but its movements, from a military point of view, were unimportant. The allies were commanded successively by Mitre, the Duke of Caxias, and the Count d'Eu.

Tripoli (trip'ō-li). A vilayet of the Turkish empire, situated about the coast of northern Africa, about long. 10°–25° E., bounded by Tunis on the northwest and by the desert on the west and south. It contains the oasis of Fezzan and other oases, and has a narrow fertile belt near the coast. The capital is Tripoli. The inhabitants are Moors, Kabyles, Arabs, Turks, etc. It was anciently a possession of Carthage, and later of Rome; was conquered by the Arabs in the 7th century, and by the Turks in the middle of the 16th century became a seat of Barbary pirates; secured its independence in 1714; and was reconquered by Turkey in 1835. Population, 800,000.

Tripoli. [Gr. Tρίπολις, name of several places regarded as including 'three cities.'] A seaport, the capital of Tripoli, in lat. 32° 54′ N., long. 13° 11′ E. It has some foreign trade, and is the starting-point of caravans for the interior. It was formerly a piratical stronghold, and several times has been bombarded. Population (estimated), 20,000–30,000.

Tripoli, or Tripolis (trip'ō-lis), or Tarabulus (tä-rä'bō-lōs). A town in Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the river Abu-Ali (Kadisha), near its mouth, in lat. 34° 27′ N., long. 35° 49′ E. It has considerable trade, fisheries, and manufactures of silk; its neighboring seaport is Al-Mina. Tripoli was an ancient Phenician city; was taken by the Saracens about 639; was besieged by the Crusaders in 1104, and taken in 1109; and was destroyed in 1289, but rebuilt. Its castle is a large structure with crenellated walls and machicolated towers. Its halls, courts, arcades, and rockcut passages and casemates are of great interest. Population, 17,000.

Tripolitan War. A war between the United States and Tripoli, 1801–05. War was declared by Tripoli June 10, 1801, because the United States refused to increase its payment for immunity from the depredations of the Tripolitan corsairs. In anticipation of this event, however, the United states had already sent a squadron to the Mediterranean. In Oct., 1803, the frigate Philadelphia, Captain Bainbridge, while chasing a corsair into the harbor of Tripoli, struck a sunken rock and was captured by the Tripolitans; she was burned by Decatur Feb. 16, 1804. In July, 1804, Commodore Edward Preble began a series of only partially successful attacks on the harbor fortifications, the fifth and last of which was made in the following September. In the meantime a land expedition under William Eaton landed Tripoli to conclude peace June 4, 1806 (see Eaton, William).

Tripolitza (trē-pō-lit'sä), or Tripolis. The capital of the nomarchy of Arcadia, Greece, in lat. 37° 30′ N., near the ancient Mantinea and Tegea. It became the capital of the pashalic of Morea in 1715; was captured by the Greeks Oct. 17, 1821; and was retaken by Ibrahim Pasha June 22, 1825, and ruined. Population (1889), 10,057.

Trip to Calais, A. A play by Foote, in which, under the name of Lady Kitty Crocodile, he unmasked the imbecile character of the notorious Duchess of Kingston. She secured the prohibition of the play, and he altered it and produced it as "The Capuchin"; but this health broke down under an indictment for criminal assault, procured by a creature of the duchess, and he died not long after.

Triptolemus (trip-tol'e-mus). [Gr. Τριπτόλεμος.] In Greek mythology, a favorite of Demeter: the inventor of the plow and patron of agriculture. He was honored in the Eleusinian mysteries.

Trip to Scarborough, A. An alteration by Sheridan of Vanbrugh's "Relapse," produced in 1777.

Trismegistus. See Hermes.

Trissino (trēs-sē'nō), Giovanni Giorgio. Born at Vicenza, Italy, July 8, 1478: died in Dec., 1550. An Italian lyric, epic, and dramatic poet and scholar. See the extract.

Gian-Giorgio Trissino had, in fact, sufficient merit to justify that celebrity which, during a whole century, placed his name in the Muses' list of fame. Born at Vicenza in 1478, of an illustrious family, he was equally qualified by his education for letters and for public business. He came to Rome when he was twenty-four years of age, and had resided there a considerable time when Pope Leo X., struck by his talents, sent him as his ambassador to the Emperor Maximilian. Under the pontificate of Clement VII. he was also employed on embassies to Charles V. and to the Republic of Venice, and was decorated by the former with the order of the Golden Fleece. In the midst of public affairs he exhibited a passion for poetry and the languages. He was rich: and, possessing a fine taste in architecture, he employed Palladio to erect a country house, in the best style, at Cricoli. Domestic vexations, and more particularly a bad wife and son, embittered his latter days. He died in 1550, aged seventy-two. The most just title to fame possessed by Trissino is founded on his "Sofonisba," which may be considered as the first regular tragedy since the revival of letters.

Sismondi, Lit. of the South of Europe, I. 408.

Trissotin (trē-sō-tan'). A "pédant" in Molière's "Les femmes savantes," intended to ridicule the Abbé Cotin.

Tristan (tris'tan). A prose Breton or Cornish romance. The first part was written or translated about 1170 by a Norman knight, Luces de Gast, who lived near Salisbury in the time of Henry II. The second part was written by Helie de Borron, who connected Tristan ("Tristram" in the English version) with the Round Table romances. The name appears in many forms, as Tristan, Tristaus, Tristanz, Tristant, Tristran, Tristeuz, Tristrant, Tristrem, Tristram, Tristren, Tristrum, Tristran, Tritan, Tritans, Tritanz, and was associated with the Latin tristis, sorrowful.

The story of Tristan seems to have been current from the earliest times. It was the subject of a number of metrical tales in the Romance languages, which were versified by the French minstrels from ancient British authorities. From these original documents, or from the French metrical tales, was compiled the sir Tristrem attributed to Thomas of Erceldoune, and which has been edited by Mr. (Sir Walter) Scott. There are also extant two fragments of metrical versions, which would be parts of another and more whole work, written by Raoul de Beauvais, who lived in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 193.

Tristan da Cunha (tris-tän' dä kön'yä). A group of three islands and two islets in the South Atlantic, in lat. 37° 3′ S., long. 12° 18′ W. They are of volcanic formation. The group includes Tristan, Inaccessible, and Nightingale. They were discovered by the Portuguese in 1506, and were taken possession of by Great Britain in 1816. Highest peak, 7,640 feet. Population (1892), about 50.

Tristan l'Ermite (trēs-toñ' ler-mēt'). The provost of Louis XI. of France, infamous for his cruelty.

Tristan und Isolde (tris'tän önt ē-zōl'de). 1. An epic poem by Eilhard von Oberge, written in the last half of the 12th century. He introduced this romance to German literature.—2. A famous epic poem by Gottfried von Strassburg, written in the 12th century, but later than Eilhard's poem. This is the classical form of the story. It was left unfinished, and sequels were written by two later poets, the last in 1300. It was closely connected with the English "Sir Tristrem" and with a Northern saga.

Troad, The. In ancient geography, the district in the northwestern corner of Asia Minor, including between the Ægean, the Hellespont, the Sea of Marmora, Mount Ida, and the Gulf of Adramyttium: the ancient Troas. It contained the Homeric Troy (which see).

Tristram, or Tristrem. See Tristan.

Tristram (tris'tram), Sir, of Lyonesse. [From L. tristis, sorrowful.] One of the most celebrated knights of the Round Table. His love for Isolde, or Iseult, the wife of King Mark, forms the subject of many romances. He was banished from the queen's country, where his mother, who died shortly after, was in great sorrow: hence she gave him the name. See Tristan.

Tristram Shandy (tris'tram shan'di). A famous novel by Sterne (9 vols., 1760–67); so called from its nominal hero. The first volume introduces Walter Shandy and his brother the Captain (Uncle Toby). Slop, and Yorick. Corporal Trim is prominent in the second volume; the third and fourth contain a good deal on the subject of noses and Shandyism; the sixth contains the episode of Le Fevre; and the Widow Wadman is introduced in the eighth. The character of Walter Shandy, Tristram's father, an opinionated, opinionold gentleman, is taken from that of Arbuthnot's Martin Scribblerus the elder.

Trita (tri-tä'). A Vedic god appearing in connection with the Maruts, Vata or Vayu, and Indra, and to whom, as to them, combats with demons, such as Vritra, and the dragon, are ascribed. He is called Aptya, a word perhaps related to ap, 'water,' and thought of as living concealed and very far away when ills are wished to Trita. Related to Trita is Traitana, the name of a superhuman being or designation of a god. With Aptya is compared the Avestan Athwya, inhabitant of the waters, the name of a family whence descended Yima and in modern Persian Athfin or Abtin, the name of the father of Faridun; with Traitana, Avestan Thraetaona (which see), modern Persian Faridun (which see).

Triton (trī'ton), [Gr. Τρίτων.] In Greek and Latin mythology, a son of Poseidon and Amphitrite (or Celæno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace at the bottom of the sea, and was a gigantic and redoubtable divinity. In the later mythology Tritons appear as a race of subordinate sea-deities, fond of pleasure and figuring with the Nereids in the train of the greater seagods: they were conceived as combining the human figure with that of lower animals or monsters. A common attribute of Triton is the shell-trumpet, which they blow to quiet the restless waves.

Tritons. See Triton.

Triumph of Cæsar, The. A series of nine paintings in tempera on linen, each nine feet square, by Mantegna, in Hampton Court Palace, England. Cæsar advances in a chariot, attended by a train of soldiers, captives, and trophies.

Triumph of Death, The. A fresco in the Campo Santo, Pisa, formerly ascribed to Oreagna, but now to the Lorenzetti (1350). It is an allegory contrasting worldly pomp and delight with their annihilation in death and with the seclusion and mortified existence.

Triumph of Galatea. See Galatea.

Triumph of Silenus. A painting by Rubens, in the Old Museum at Berlin (until 1885 at Blenheim Palace). Silenus totters forward, supported by a negro and a satyr and preceded by a faun with a flute. In front are boys and a tiger, and behind nymphs and satyrs with a landscape background. Vandyke is said to have collaborated in this painting.

Triumvirate (trī-um'vi-rāt), First. In Roman history, an agreement or alliance formed in B. C. 60 between Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, for the purpose of dividing the power among them. Cæsar obtained the consulship for the next year (59) and a command in Cisalpine Gaul (extended to Transalpine Gaul) and Illyricum for 5 years (extended for 5 years more). Pompey received for his veterans assignments of lands, and for himself later the commissionership of corn supplies. By a renewal of the league at Lucca in 55, Pompey received the consulship and command in Spain, and Crassus the consulship in Syria and in the East (where he was killed in 53). The union between Cæsar and Pompey was formally broken by the civil war in 49.

Triumvirate, Second. An alliance formed in 43 B. C. between Octavian (Augustus), Mark Antony, and Lepidus, on an island in the river Reno, near Bologna. The triumvirs were to have consular powers for 3 years: they appointed magistrates, and their decrees were valid as laws. Octavian received Africa and the islands; Antony, Gaul; Lepidus, Spain and Narbonensis. The alliance was followed by a wholesale proscription, and by the overthrow of the republicans under Brutus and Cassius in 42. Lepidus was soon reduced to a minor position, and eventually banished. By a treaty at Brundisium Octavian received the West and Antony the East. The union was broken in 33, and Antony was overthrown in the battle of Actium.

Trivia (triv'i-ä), or the Art of Walking the Streets of London. A burlesque poem by Gay, published in 1716. It is a mine of information on outdoor life in the reign of Queen Anne.

Troad (trō'ad), The.

Trobriand (trō-brē-ȯn'). Philippe Regis de. Born at Tours, France, June 4, 1816. A French-American officer, journalist, and author. He emigrated to the United States in 1841; was editor and proprietor of the "Revue de Nouveau Monde," New York, 1849–50; and was joint editor of the "Courrier des Etats-Unis" 1854–61. He joined the United States volunteer service as colonel in 1861, and became brigadier-general of volunteers in 1864. He commanded a brigade of the 24 army corps in the engagements at Deep Bottom, Petersburg, Hatcher's Run, and Five Forks, and was at the head of a division in the final operations against Richmond. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers in 1865; entered the regular army as colonel of the 34st infantry in 1866; and was placed on the retired list in 1870. Author of "Quatre ans de campagnes a l'armee du Potomac" (1867).

Trobriand (trō-brē-ȧnd') Islands. A group of small islands, east of New Guinea and south of New Britain.

Trocadero (trō-kȧ-dā'rō). A fort near Cadiz, Spain, taken by the French Aug. 31, 1823.

Trocadéro. A square in Paris, situated on the right bank of the Seine, opposite the Champ-de-Mars. It contained the Exposition building in 1878.

Trocadéro, Palais du. See Palais du Trocadéro.

Trochu (trō-shü'). Louis Jules. Born at Palais, Morbihan, France, March 12, 1815. A French general. He served in Algeria, in the Crimean war, and in the Italian war of 1859; was appointed governor of Paris in Aug., 1870; became member of the government of national defense and was charged with the defense of Paris in Sept.; resigned in Jan., 1871; was a deputy 1871–1872; and resigned from the army in 1873. He wrote "L'armee francaise en 1867," and several works in his own defense.

Trœzen (trē'zen). [Gr. Τροιζήν.] In ancient geography, a city of Peloponnesus, Greece, situated near the coast 39 miles southwest of Athens. It was originally an Ionian settlement, but later became Doric. It took active part in the Persian wars, and sided later with Sparta.

Trœzen, anciently Posidonia (Strab. viii. p. 542; Steph. Byz. ad voc.), was situated on the eastern coast of the Peloponnese, not quite 15 stadia from the shore, between the peninsula of Methana and Hermione. The remains of the ancient city may be traced near the modern village of Dhamala, but they are scanty and possess little interest. Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 84, note.

Troglodytæ (trog-lō-di'tē). [L., from Gr. τρωγλοδύτης, one who creeps into holes.] Cave-dwellers; troglodytes: a name given in antiquity to various races of men, especially to certain inhabitants of the shores of the Red Sea.

Trogus Pompeius (trō'gus pom-pē'yus). Lived about 10 A. D. A Roman historian, author of a general history, partly preserved in an epitome by Justin. See the extract.

About the same time as Livy, and as it were to supplement his history, Pompeius Trogus wrote his Universal History, Historiæ Philippicæ, in 44 books, beginning with Ninus and extending to the writer's own time, from a Greek source (probably Timagenes); it was composed in a lively style and classical diction, and was more rich in material and less rhetorical than Livy. We know the work chiefly through the abridgment of Justinus. Besides his historical work, Trogus wrote also on zoology and botany, after the best authorities, Aristotle and Theophrastus.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), I. 531.

Troil (troil). Magnus. The udaler or magnate of Zetland in Scott's novel "The Pirate." His daughters Minna and Brenda are the principal female characters.

Troilus (trō'i-lus). In Greek legend, according to a common account, a son of Priam. See Troilus and Cressida.

Troilus and Cressida (trō'i-lus and kres'i-dȧ). 1. A poem by Chaucer, written about 1369. It is a version of Boccaccio's "Filostrato." There are additions, however, which show his reading of the "Geste de Troie" of Benoit de Sainte-Maure (in which the story first appeared) and an addition of Sainte-Maure to the legendary history of Troy ascribed to Dares Phrygius and Dictys Cretensis, one of the Latin version of Sainte-Maure by Guido Colonna. The Lollius to whom Chaucer attributes the story is now thought to be mythical.

2. A play by Dekker and Chettle, acted in 1599.—3. A tragedy by Shakspere, thought to be altered from an older one. It was played at the Globe about 1601, licensed to be printed in 1603 and 1609, and printed in the folio edition of 1623.

Troilus and Cressida, or Truth Found too Late. A play by Dryden, printed in 1678, in which he undertook to "correct" what he "opined was in all probability" one of "Shakspere's first Endeavours on the Stage."

Trois Couleurs (trwȧ kö-lėr'). Les. [F., 'The Tricolor.'] A popular French political song, written after 1830 by Adolphe Vogel, celebrating the fall of the white flag and the return of the tricolor.

Trois Échelles (trwȧ zā-shel'). [F., 'three ladders.'] The executioners of Louis XI. of France. Scott introduces him in "Quentin Durward."

Trois Mousquetaires (trwȧ mös-ke-tȧr'). Les. [F., 'The Three Musketeers.'] A novel by Alexandre Dumas père, published in 1844. The scene is laid in the time of Richelieu. The three musketeers are Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, but D'Artagnan is the principal character. See these names.

Troizen. See Trœzen.

Trojan (trō'jan) Cycle, The. A group of legends or poems relating to the Trojan war. See Cyclic Poets.

Trojan War. In Greek legend, a war waged for ten years by the confederated Greeks under the lead of Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ and Argolis, against the Trojans and their allies, for the recovery of Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta or Lacedæmon, who had been carried off by Paris, son of the Trojan king Priam. See Iliad.

The dates for the Trojan war vary almost two centuries. Duris placed it as early as 1334 B. C. Eratosthenes (Stromat. i. p. 337, A.), Clemens in B. C. 1149. Isocrates, Ephorus, Democritus, and Phanias seemed to have inclined to the later, Herodotus, Thucydides, the author of the Life of Homer, and the compiler of the Parian Marble, to the earlier period. The date now usually received, B. C. 1183, is that of Eratosthenes, whose chronology was purely artificial and rested on no solid basis. The following is a list of the principal views on this subject: Duris placed the fall of Troy in 1335 B. C.; author of the Life of Homer, 1270; Herodotus, Thucydides, 1200; Parian Marble, 1209; Eratosthenes, 1183; Sosibius, 1171; Ephorus, 1149; Clemens, 1149. Rawlinson, Herod., II. 223, note.

Trollope (trol'up). Anthony, Born at London, April 24, 1815; died Dec. 6, 1882. An English novelist, son of Frances Trollope. He studied at Harrow and Winchester, and spent the greater part of his life in the postal service, as inspector in Ireland, England, and abroad. Troy (troi). [L. Troja, Gr. Τροία, Τρωία, Τροίη, Τρωίη.] An ancient city of the Troad, famous in Greek legend as the capital of Priam and the object of the siege by the allied Greeks under Agamemnon. See Iliad and Trojan War. The site of this Homeric city was generally believed in antiquity to be identical with that of the Greek Ilium (which see), the modern Hissarlik; and this view has been supported in recent times most notably by Schliemann, whose explorations at Hissarlik laid bare remains of a series (6 or 7) of ancient towns, one above the other, at least one of which is universally admitted to be prehistoric. The third and later the second from the bottom he identified with the Homeric town. On the other hand, some scholars regard the situation of Ilium irreconcilable with Homer's description of Troy, and prefer a site in the neighborhood of the modern Bunarbashi, holding Schliemann's results to be inconclusive.

Trull (trō'lh). [MGr. Τρούλλος.] See the extract.

> Some Gothic soldiers bought from some Vandals a trulla of wheat for an aureus. As the trulla was only the third part of a pint, and 100 aureus was worth about twelve shillings, the bargain did not redound greatly to the profit of the Visigoths, who received from the other nation the contemptuous nickname of Trull. Many a time, as we can well imagine, were the streets of Spanish towns made red with Teuton blood, and the yellow locks of slain barbarians lay thick across the pathway, after the taunting shout "Trull," had some unknown way of answering defiance had greeted the ears of the trembling provincials.

Tubal (tū′bal). One of the sons of Japheth, according to the account in Genesis.

Tubal and Meshech, whose names follow that of Javan, are almost always coupled together in the Old Testament, and were famous for their skill in archery. In the Assyrian inscriptions the names appear as Tubla and Muska, and they were known to the classical geographers as Tibareni and Moschi. In classical days, however, their seats were further to the north than they had been in the age of the Assyrian monuments. In the time of Sargon and Sennacherib's 8th century their settlements extended as far south as Cilicia and the northern half of Komagéné. Later they were forced to retreat northward towards the Black Sea, and it was in this region of Asia Minor that Xenophon and his Greek troops found their scanty remains.

Tubal-Cain (tū′bal-kān or -kā′in). Son of Lamech the Cainite and Zillah: the pioneer of workers in brass and iron, according to the account in Genesis.

Tubantes (tū-ban′tēz). [L. (Tacitus) Tubantes, Gr. (Ptolemy) Τοὐβαντες.] A German tribe located by Tacitus on the right bank of the Rhine, north of the Lippe, in territory afterward occupied by the Usipites. Ptolemy subsequently places them farther to the south, between the Rhine, and the Chatti. They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Tubar (tō-bär′). See Tarahumar.

Tübingen (tü′bing-en). A town in the Black Forest circle, Württemberg, situated on the Neckar, at the junction of the Ammer and Steinlach, 18 miles south-southwest of Stuttgart. The castle Hohentübingen, built in the first half of the 16th century, occupies a commanding position: it now contains the university library. The university, one of the most celebrated in Germany, was founded by Count Eberhard-im-Bart in 1477. It adhered to the Reformation, and has long been noted for its theological teaching, which, especially under F. C. Baur, founder of the so-called "Tubingen School" (which see), has latterly been distinctively of a liberal and advanced kind. The university had 74 instructors and about 1,200 students in 1895. Tübingen fell to Wurtemberg in 1342. It was taken by the Swabian League in 1519, and by the French in 1647 and 1688. Population (1890), 13,273.

Tübingen, Treaty of. A treaty, concluded on July 10, 1514, by which Duke Ulrich's subjects secured certain privileges from him in return for their payment of his debts.

Tübingen School. A name given to a certain phase of modern rationalistic philosophy which took its rise (1825–60) at the University of Tübingen, in Germany, under Ferdinand Christian Baur. The fundamental principle of this school is that the books of the New Testament were written for the purpose of establishing certain opinions and parties in the early church; that many of them were written at a later date than the one usually assigned to them; and that they are rather valuable as indications of the spirit of the early church than as authoritative revelations or even as authentic records. The name is also sometimes, though more rarely, given to an earlier school in the same university which taught almost exactly the reverse — namely, the credibility integrity, and authority of the New Testament.

Tubuai (tō-bū-ī′) Islands. A group of islands in Polynesia, south of the Society Islands, belonging to France since 1881. Population of Tubuai and Raivavae (1881), 881.

Tubular Bridge, Britannia. See Britannia Tubular Bridge.

Tucca (tuk′ä), Captain. A bragging bully in Jonson's "Poetaster." Dekker introduces him in his "Satiromastix," built without the success which attended Jonson's character.

Tucca is the creation of Jonson. He is described as a general sailor, a man whose whole conversation is made up of scurrilous exaggerations and impossible falsehoods.

Gifford, Memoirs of Ben Jonson, p. xii., note.

Tuck (tuk), Friar. A vagabond monk, a character in the Robin Hood ballads and legends and in the morris-dance. Sir Walter Scott introduces him in "Ivanhoe" as the "holy clerk of Copmanhurst."

Tucker (tuk′er), Abraham. Born at London, Sept. 2, 1705: died Nov. 20, 1774. An English metaphysician and moralist. He wrote "The Light of Nature Pursued" under the pseudonym "Edward Search" (vol. i., 1768; 2 vols. edited after his death; edited again by Mildmay in 1836).

Tucker, Charlotte. Born in England in 1821: died in India, Dec. 2, 1893. An English writer, mostly of juvenile or religious works under the signature "A. L. O. E." (A Lady of England). While she was fifty years old she went as a missionary to India, and worked there for eighteen years. She wrote more than fifty volumes, the proceeds of which were used for the benefit of the mission.

Tucker, Nathaniel Beverley. Born at Williamsburg, Va., Sept. 6, 1784: died at Winchester, Va., Aug. 26, 1851. An American jurist, novelist, and political writer. His best-known work is the novel "The Partisan Leader: a Tale of the Future" (1836).

Tuckerman (tuk′er-man), Edward. Born at Boston, Mass., Dec., 1817: died at Amherst, Mass., March 15, 1886. An American botanist, noted as a lichenologist: professor at Amherst College from 1858.

Tuckerman, Henry Theodore. Born at Boston, Mass., April 20, 1813: died at New York, Dec. 17, 1871. An American critic, essayist, and poet. His works include "Italian Sketch-Book" (1835), "Isabel, or Sicily" (1839), "Ramblets and Reveries" (1841), "Thoughts on the Poets" (1846), "Artist Life" (1847), "Characteristics of Literature" (1849–51), "Essays" (1857), and "Book of the Artists" (1867).

Tuckerman's Ravine. [Named from Prof. Edward Tuckerman.] A deep ravine on the side of Mount Washington, New Hampshire.

Tucson (tū-son′ or tuk′son). The capital of Pima County, Arizona, situated on the Santa Cruz River in lat. 32° 14′ N. It is one of the chief towns in the southern part of the territory. It was founded by Spanish Jesuits in the middle of the 16th century. Population (1890), 5,150.

Tucuman (tō-kō-män′). A colonial division (corregimiento) of Spanish South America. It corresponded nearly to the modern provinces of Cordoba, Rioja, Catamarca, Santiago del Estero, Tucuman, Salta and Jujuy, now in the Argentine Republic. The capital (1593), Tucuman, was a part of the vicerovalty of Peru, subordinate to Charcas, until 1776, when it was attached to the viceroyalty of La Plata.

Tucuman, an interior province of the Argentine Republic, surrounded by Salta, Santiago del Estero, and Catamarca. The surface is hilly. Principal products, sugar, rum, and wheat. Area, about 13,000 square miles. Population, about 150,000.

Tucuman, San Miguel de Tucuman. The capital of the province of Tucuman, situated on the Tala about lat. 26° 50′ S. Independence was proclaimed here July 9, 1816. Population, 25,000.

Tucunas (tō-kō′näs), or Ticunas (tē-kō′näs). Indians of the upper Amazon and its branches in northeastern Peru and the adjacent parts of Brazil. They are divided into many small hordes, and are savages of a rather low grade, though harmless and friendly to the whites. The Jesuits labored among them from 1683 to 1737.

Tudela (tō-thā′lä). A town in the province of Navarre, Spain, situated on the Ebro 47 miles northwest of Saragossa. A victory was gained near Tudela, Nov., 1808, by the French under Lannes over the Spanish. Population (1887), 9,213.

Tudor (tū′dor). [W. Tewdyr, L. Theodorus, Gr. Θεόδωρος: see Theodorus.] An English dynasty, descended on the male side from Owen Tudor, on the female side from John of Gaunt through the Beauforts. It comprised the sovereigns Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth.

Tudor, Jasper, Earl of Pembroke. Died about 1495. Son of Owen Tudor and Catharine of France, and uncle of Henry VII.: a Lancastrian partizan.

Tudor, Owen. Executed 1461. A Welsh knight who married Catharine, widow of Henry V., and was grandfather of Henry VII. He joined the Lancastrians.

Tuesday (tūz′dā). The third day of the week.

Tufts (tufts) College. An institution of learning founded by Charles Tufts, situated at Medford, Massachusetts: opened in 1855, under Universalist control. In 1893 it had 350 students.

Tugendbund (tö′gend-bönd). A German association formed at Königsberg, 1808, with the acknowledged purpose of cultivating patriotism, reorganizing the army, and encouraging education, and with the secret aim of aiding in throwing off the French yoke. Frederick William III. was forced to dissolve it in 1809; but it continued in secret for several years, and exerted a very considerable influence, especially in 1812. It was vehemently attacked in 1816 by reactionary politicians.

Tuggurt (tög-gurt′). A town in an oasis in the province of Constantine, Algeria, about lat. 33° 14′ N. Population, about 5,000.

Tugh (tögh). See the extract.

The Tugh, or ensign of the Turkish tribes, was originally the tail of a yak; but when the Ottomans left Central Asia, that of a horse was substituted. Governments or provinces received two, or three tughs, according to their rank; the Sultan alone displayed seven.

Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 278, note.

Tughra (tögh′rä). See the extract.

Among the functionaries who formed the first department were the Defterdar, or Minister of Finance, and the Nishanji Bashi, whose duty was to trace the Tughra or cypher of the Sultan at the head of all the documents presented to him for that purpose. This Tughra, with the appearance of which most of us are familiar from seeing it on Turkish coins and postage-stamps or on pieces of embroidery or inlaid mother-of-pearl work, contains, ornamentally written as a sort of monogram, the names of the reigning Sultan and his father, together with the title Khan and the epithet unsurpassable, or "victor ever." The Tughra is said to have originated in this way: Sultan Murád I. entered into a treaty with the Ragusans, but when the document was brought to his signature he, being unable to write, wetted his open hand with ink and pressed it on the paper. The first, second, and third fingers were together, but the thumb and fourth finger were apart. Within the mark formed the scribes wrote the names of Murád and this father, the title Khan, and the "victor ever." The Tughra, as we now have it, is the result of this: the three right fingers have represented Murád's three middle fingers, the rounded lines at the left side are his bent thumb, and the straight ones at the right his little finger.

Tuhwalati. See Atfalati.

Tuileries (twē′le-riz; F. pron. twēl-rē′), Palace of the. [F. tuileries, tile-kilns.] A royal residence formerly existing in Paris, connected with the Louvre by wings. In 1518 Francis I. bought a house here for the Duchesse d'Angoulême. It was demolished in 1564 by Catharine de' Medici, who began the erection of the Tuileries, which was enlarged by Henry IV. and Louis XIV. The palace, the scene of many of the most memorable events including the subversion of the ancient French monarchy, was invaded by the mob June 20, and stormed by the mob Aug. 10, 1792, and was the seat of the Convention. It was attacked by the people Feb. 24, 1848, and was burned by the Commune in 1871, with all its art treasures, the ruins not being removed till 1883. Nothing remains except the pavilions at the two extremities, which have been restored and now form a rich architectural termination to the two extended arms of the Louvre. Its history as a royal residence came to an end with the battle of Sedan and the departure of the empress Eugénie. The Jardin des Tuileries, a popular promenade, was enlarged in 1889, and now covers the site of the palace. The Quai des Tuileries existed at a very early period as the road to St.-Cloud. The wall of Charles V. terminated at the Tour du Bois, between the Louvre and the Tuileries, on the north side of it. Here the tile-yards or tuileries, mentioned as early as 1274. In 1865 excavations disclosed the furnaces of Palissy here.

Tuke (tūk), William. Born at York, 1732: died 1822. An English philanthropist. He was especially devoted to the amelioration of the condition of the insane. In 1792 he projected the "Retreat" at York under the management of the Society of Friends, in which it was attempted to manage the insane without the excessive restraint then common. His improvements led to important legislation on the treatment of the insane after his death. His grandson, Samuel Tuke (1784–1857) wrote an account of the Retreat (1813), and published works on the construction of hospitals for the insane.

Tukuarika (tö kwä-rē′kä). or Tucarica, or Sheep-eaters. ['Sheep-eaters.'] A tribe of North American Indians, formerly in Yellowstone Park, subsequently on Lemhi and Malad rivers in western central Idaho, and now on Lemhi reservation. Number (1893), 108. See Shoshoni.

Tunguses (tōn-gō'sez). A Mongolian people, chiefly nomads, dwelling in eastern and central Siberia, east of the Yenisei, and in the basin of the Amur. Their numbers are estimated at 70,000–80,000.

Tunis (tū'nis), F. Tunisie (tü-nē-sē'). A French protectorate in northern Africa. Capital, Tunis. It is bounded by the Mediterranean on the north and east, Tripoli on the southeast, the southern line of Algeria on the west. The north, east, and center are occupied by comparatively low mountains, and there are considerable lakes ("chotts") in the south. The principal river is the Medjerda. The island of Jerba and the Kerkenna group belong to Tunis. It produces grain and fruits (particularly dates, olives, etc.), and has important fisheries. Government is administered nominally by a native bey, actually by France through a minister resident, supported by a corps of occupation. The inhabitants are Berbers, Arabs, and Jews, and in less numbers Italians, Turks, Maltese, and French. The prevailing religion is the Mohammedan. The region in ancient times formed part of the dominion of Carthage and of Rome, and as part of Roman Africa it flourished greatly under the empire, and was the leading seat of Latin Christianity. It was conquered by the Vandals in the 5th century, by the Greeks in the 6th, and by the Arabs in the 7th; was invaded by St. Louis in 1270, and by the emperor Charles V. in 1535; was reduced to a Turkish province about 1574; was ravaged by deys and beys, and was long noted as a piratical state; and was occupied by a French army in 1881, and (May 21) made a French protectorate. Area, about 45,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 1,500,000.

Tunis. A seaport, capital of Tunis, situated on a lagoon connected with the Gulf of Tunis, in lat. 36° 50′ N., long. 10° 12′ E.: the Roman Tunes. The port Goletta is situated at the entrance to the lagoon. The city is connected by a canal navigated by steamer lines with France and Italy, and by a railroad with Constantine, Oran, and Algiers; and has textile and other manufactures. The seat of government is at the immediately adjacent site of Bardo. Among the interest are the bazaars, the mosque of the Olive Tree, the town palace of the bey, and the Moslem college and other institutions. The ruins of Carthage are 9 miles to the northeast. The city was founded in Carthaginian times. It was conquered by the emperor Charles V. in 1535. Population, estimated, 150,000.

Tunis, Gulf of. An inlet of the Mediterranean, northeast of Tunis.

Tunja (tōn'hä). The capital of the department of Boyacá, Colombia, 75 miles north-northeast of Bogotá. Near it is the battle-field of Boyacá (which see). Population, estimated, 8,000.

Tunstall (tun'stal), A town in Staffordshire, England, 29 miles south of Manchester. It has manufactures of pottery, ironware, etc. Population (1891), 15,730.

Tunstall (tun'stal, or Tonstall (ton'stal). Cuthbert. Born at Hatchford, Yorkshire, England, about 1475: died at Lambeth Palace, 1559. An English prelate. He was made bishop of London in 1522, but was deprived of his see in 1553. He was in the Tower; was restored by Mary; and was again deprived by Elizabeth in 1559. He was lord privy seal under Henry VIII.

Tuolomo. See Tulomo.

Tuolumne (twol'um-nē) River. A river in California which joins the San Joaquin River 25 miles south of Stockton. Length, 150–175 miles.

Tupac (tō'päk), called Toparca (tō-par'kä) by Spanish historians. Born about 1514: died at Jauja, Oct., 1533. A younger brother of the Inca Atahualpa of Peru. After the execution of Atahualpa by Pizarro, he was made sovereign of Peru by Pizarro, and forced to swear allegiance to the Spanish monarchs. He died during the march to Cuzco.

Tupac Amaru (tō'päk ä'mä-rō). Born about 1544: died at Cuzco, Dec. (?), 1571. Youngest son of the Inca: a legitimate sovereign of Peru by the death of his elder brothers. He assumed the Incarial insignia in the mountains of Vilcabamba, but made no attempt to oppose the Spaniards. By order of the viceroy Toledo he was seized in Oct., 1571, taken to Cuzco, and beheaded. With him the male line of the Incas became extinct.

Tupac Amaru (José Gabriel Condorcanqui). Born at Tinta, south of Cuzco, 1742: died at Cuzco, May 17, 1781. A Peruvian revolutionist, called "the Last of the Incas." He was a direct descendant of the early Incas, and, under Spanish rule, was chief of several villages. In 1771 he assumed the name Tupac Amaru. After vain efforts to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, he headed a rebellion in Nov., 1780. Over 60,000 Indians joined him, and he was universally regarded by them as the Inca, though he did not assume that title or promise anything more than a redress of wrongs. For a time he held all the region between Cuzco and Lake Titicaca, but was defeated and captured on March 6, in consequence of a sentence by the Spanish judge Areche, he and most of his family were executed in a horrible manner. In the war of extermination which followed it is said that the Indians were killed. His cousin, Diego, after holding out for some time, was pardoned; but subsequently was arrested on a frivolous charge and, with others of the family, was tortured and killed. Women and children were included in these executions, the evident object being to extirpate the Inca race. Tupac Amaru's son Fernando, a child of 10 years, was condemned to penal servitude for life. He was sent to Spain, and his ultimate fate is unknown; but in 1828 a person calling himself Fernando Tupac Amaru was given a pension at Buenos Ayres: he became a monk in Lima, where he died. The rebellion of Tupac Amaru was the most formidable in the colonial history of South America. The cruelties with which it was suppressed, by exciting hatred of the Spaniards, had a strong influence on the war for independence. The reforms which Tupac Amaru demanded were instituted in part not long after his death.

Tupac Yupanqui (tō'päk yō-pän'kē), or Tupac Inca Yupanqui. Died at Cuzco about 1478. The tenth Inca sovereign of Peru, and the greatest conqueror of the line. He succeeded his father, Pachacutec Yupanqui, about 1440, conquered the coast region from Ancon to the Gulf of Guayaquil (see Chimos), annexed northern Chile to the previously Made Tucuman and large districts in the Amazon valley; and even, it is said, sent an exploring expedition of rafts which discovered the Chincha Islands. Many remains of fortresses, towns, temples, etc., are ascribed to his time. Also Topa Inca Yupanqui.

Tupi-Guarany stock. Same as Tupi stock.

Tupis (tō-pēz'). A general name for Brazilian Indians of the Tupi stock in Brazil, especially near the coast and on the lower Amazon. Their language in those regions was essentially the same, though the Indians were divided into many tribes: it was closely allied to the Guarany of Paraguay, and is the basis of the modern Lingoa Geral. See Tupi stock. Also written Tupis, Tupies.

Tupi stock (tō-pē' stok). One of the most important of the South American Indian linguistic stocks, extending over a great part of Brazil, Paraguay, and Uruguay, and portions of the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, Peru, Colombia, Venezuela, and Guiana. Their villages were generally near the coast or along or near great rivers, and often interspersed with those of Indians of other stocks. All of them, except a few tribes of the interior, spoke dialects so closely allied that they could readily understand each other. Their physical characteristics and customs were much the same; but they had no national organization: neighboring towns were often at war with each other, and distant ones had no knowledge of each other. The power of their chiefs was very limited, and was generally confined to a single village. The Tupis were agricultural, and lived in fixed villages of considerable size, the houses framed with poles and thatched with palm-leaves or grass. They made large and serviceable wooden canoes, showed taste in ornamenting pottery, making feather-work, etc., and were naturally intelligent. Most of them went nearly naked, painting or tattooing the face and body. In war they used bows and arrows and a heavy club called macaud. They believed in certain malignant or mischievous spirits, and their medicine-men had great influence. Generally they were friendly to strangers, but when provoked were fierce warriors. Some of the tribes killed and ate their prisoners of war. The first European colonists found these Indians the dominant race all along the Brazilian coast in the lower valley of the Amazon, and in the valley of the Paraguay; and when the Spanish power was established in Paraguay, Uruguay, Paraná, and Paraguay; those about the Platine river-system were called collectively Guaranys, as those on the Brazilian coast were called Tupis. Both of these names was properly a tribal appellation. Most of these Indians submitted readily to missionary influence, and their descendants, mixed with European and African blood, form a large part of the country population of Brazil, northern Uruguay, northeastern Argentina, and Paraguay. A few, in the interior, retain a semi-independence. Among the extinct or existing tribes of the Tupi stock are the Tupinambas, Tupiniquins, Potiguaras, Papanazes, Caites, Tupinaes, and Tamoyos of the Brazilian coast; the Tupinambas, Hiacas, Manduricis, Arapiuns, Apiacas, etc., in the Amazon valley; the Guarayos and Chiriguanos in Bolivia, Tapes in the Argentine, Guaranys, etc.

Tupman (tup'man), Tracy. A member of the famous Pickwick Club, in Dickens's "Pickwick Papers."

Tupper (tup'ėr), Sir Charles. Born at Amherst, Nova Scotia, July 2, 1821. A Canadian Conservative statesman. He studied medicine in Edinburgh University; settled as a physician in his native town of Amherst, Nova Scotia; and was president of the Canadian Medical Association 1857–58. He represented the provincial legislature in 1855, and was prime minister of Nova Scotia 1864–67. He advocated the formation of the Dominion of Canada, which took place in 1867; and in 1870 entered Macdonald's cabinet, going out of office with his chief in 1873. He took office as minister of public works on Macdonald's return to power in 1878, and from 1879 to 1884 was minister of railways and canals, in which capacity he promoted the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1884 he was appointed high commissioner for Canada at London, a post which he still (1893) occupies. He was one of the negotiators of the fisheries treaty with the United States 1887–88, being created a baronet in the latter year for his services on that occasion.

Tupper, Martin Farquhar. Born at London, July 17, 1810: died Nov. 29, 1889. An English poet. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1831, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1835, but soon abandoned law in order to devote himself to literature. His chief work is "Proverbial Philosophy" (three series 1838–67).

Tur (tör). In the Shahnamah, the second of the three sons — Salm, Tur, and Iraj — of Faridun. His mother was Shahrinaz, daughter of Jamshid. In the division by Faridun of his realms Tur obtained Turan. Roused to jealousy of Iraj by Salm, he joins Salm against him, and murders Iraj when the latter comes with overtures of peace. Iraj is avenged by Minuchihr, who slays Tur in battle.

Tura (tö'rä). A river in eastern Russia and western Siberia which joins the Tobol below Tyumen. Length, about 500 miles.

Turanian (tū-rā'ni-an). [Pers. Tūrān, from Tūr, a legendary ancestor of the Turks, etc.] A word loosely and indefinitely used to designate a family of languages and also an ethnological group. It is sometimes applied to the Asiatic languages in general outside of the Indo-European and Semitic families, and sometimes various discordant and independent families, but sometimes used especially or restrictedly of the Ural Altaic or Scythian family.

Turbervile, or Turberville (tėr'bėr-vil), George. Born about 1530: died about 1595. An English poet, translator, and writer on hunting.

[George] Turberville, of whom not much is known, was a Dorsetshire man of good family, and was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He was probably born before 1530, and died after 1594. Besides a book on Falconry and numerous translations (to which, like all the men of his school and day, he was much addicted), he wrote a good many occasional poems, though none of great length.
Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 18.

Turbia (tör'bē-ä). [F. Turbie.] A small place near Monaco. It contains a Roman tower of the time of Augustus.

Turcaret (tür-kā-rā'). A comedy by Le Sage, produced in 1708; so called from its chief character.

Despite his theatrical successes he [Le Sage] was never on very good terms with the players of the regular theatre, and a small piece—"Le Traitre"—was refused by them at the beginning of 1708. The author took it back, set to work on it, and refashioned it into "Turcaret," the best French comedy, beyond all doubt, of the 18th century, and probably the best of its kind to be found outside the covers of Molière's works.
Saintsbury, French Novelists, p. 71.

Turcomans. See Turkomans.

Turdus Solitarius (tėr'dus sol-i-tā'ri-us). [NL., 'Solitary Thrush.'] A constellation introduced by Le Monnier in 1776, on the tail of Hydra, and encroaching on the southern scale of Libra. It is no longer recognized.

Turenne (tü-ren'). A place in the department of Corrèze, France, 18 miles southwest of Tulle. It has a ruined château.

Turenne, Vicomte de (Henri de La Tour d'Auvergne). Born at Sedan, France, Sept. 11, 1611: killed at Sasbach, near Offenburg, Baden, July 27, 1675. A celebrated French marshal, grandson of William the Silent. He was brought up in the Reformed Church; learned the art of war under his uncle Maurice of Nassau, and was given a regiment in the French army by Richelieu in 1630. He served with distinction under De la Force, Cardinal La Valette, Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar, and Guébriant, and in 1639 was appointed to a command in Italy. He was in 1643 transferred to Germany by Mazarin, by whom he was created a marshal of France in 1644. His four brilliant campaigns in Germany (1644–47) prepared the way materially for the peace of Westphalia in 1648. During the disturbances of the Fronde (1648–53) he at first supported the parliament, but afterward sided with the court, and in 1652 defeated Conde at Gien and at the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. After the return of peace at home, he took command against the Spaniards under Conde (who had in the meantime fled from France and accepted the post of general-in-chief of the Spanish armies). His victory of the Dunes in 1658 decided the war, and was followed by the peace of the Pyrenees in 1659. He was created marshal-general of the armies of France in 1660; conquered French Flanders in 1667; abjured Protestantism and joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1668; commanded in the Netherlands in 1672; and devastated the Palatinate in 1674. He was opposed during the next campaign by the Imperial general Montecuculi, and was killed by a cannon-ball while reconnoitering at Sasbach.

Turfan (tör-fän'). An occasional name of a part of Eastern Turkestan.

Turgai (tör-gī'), or Turgansk (tör-gansk'). A province in the Kirghiz Steppe, Russian Central Asia, situated east of Uralsk and north of the Sea of Aral and Syr-Daria. Area, 176,219 square miles. Population (1889), 364,660.

Turgenieff (tör-gä'nef or tör-ge-nef'), Alexander. Born 1784: died at Moscow, Dec. 17, 1845. A Russian historian, author of "Historica Russiæ monumenta" (1841–42), etc.

Turgenieff, Ivan Sergyevich. Born at Orel, Russia, Nov. 9, 1818: died at Bougival, near Paris, Sept. 3, 1883. A celebrated Russian novelist. He was educated at Moscow and St. Petersburg, and in 1838 went to Berlin to study philosophy and the classics. About 1840 he received an appointment in the ministry of the interior. He began to publish poems in 1841; and his first novel, "Andrei Kolossoff," appeared in 1844. He contributed to the emancipation of the serfs through his "Annals of a Sportsman," sometimes translated as "Sketches from the Diary of a Sportsman" (1845–57): the first of these appeared in English in the "Contemporary Review" in 1847. They were also published in French and German, and raised him to high rank as an author. In 1852 some remarks on Russian officialism, made in an obituary letter on Gogol, led to his being deprived of his position, imprisoned, and afterward banished several years in Orel, in the interior of Russia. In 1854 he was allowed to return, and in later life lived in Baden-Baden and Paris, with short visits to Russia and elsewhere. He created much personal antagonism by his analysis of political parties, and was misunderstood by those with whom he was most in sympathy. The epithet "Nihilist," which he applied to revolutionary, was applied by the government to all socialistic and democratic tendencies. Later, however, popular opinion was in his favor. Among his chief novels are "Rudine" (1855), "A Nest of Nobles" (1858), "Helene" (translated as "On the Eve," 1860), "Fathers and Sons" (1862: in this the epithet Nihilist is introduced and defined), "Smoke" (1867), "Virgin Soil" (1876), "Punin and Baburin," "A Lear of the Steppe," "Clara Militch." He also wrote "Senilia" (1883: a poem), etc. The name is also written Turgenef, Tourgueniff, etc.

Turgenieff, Nikolai. Born 1790: died at Paris, Nov., 1871. A Russian historian, brother of Alexander Turgenieff. He wrote "La Russie et les Russes" (1847), etc.

Turgot (tür-gō'), Anne Robert Jacques, Baron de L'Aulne. Born at Paris, May 10, 1727: died there, March 20, 1781. A noted French statesman, political economist, and financier. He at first studied theology and then law, and became an advocate in 1752, and master of "requetes" in 1753. He was intendant of Limoges 1761–74; and was appointed minister of marine in 1774, and immediately afterward controller-general of finance. In his office he planned many reforms, including the abolition of corvées and of various feudal privileges, the securing of liberty of trade, the establishment of a comprehensive system of public instruction, etc., outlining many of the results afterward attained by the Revolution. He was bitterly opposed by various classes, and was dismissed by the king in May, 1776. His complete works were edited by Dupont de Nemours 1808–11.

Turia (tö'ri-ä). The ancient name of the Guadalaviar.

Turin (tū'rin). A province in the compartimento of Piedmont, Italy. Area, 3,955 square miles. Population (1892), 1,097,479.

Turin, It. Torino (tō-rē'nō). The capital of the province of Turin, Italy, situated on the Po, near its junction with the Dora Riparia, in lat. 45° 4′ N., long. 7° 4′ E.: the ancient Taurinasia, Roman Augusta Taurinorum (whence the modern name). It is regularly built, with many squares and broad streets; is the seat of important trade for northern Italy; has varied manufactures; and is naturally growing. It contains a university, cathedral, castle (Palazzo Madama), royal palace (with the royal armory and library), Palazzo Carignano (former seat of Parliament, now containing collections in natural history), palace of the Academy of Sciences (with a museum of antiquities and picture-gallery), monument of Cavour, etc. Victor Emanuel had his residence here. Turin was the early ancient capital of the Taurini (whence the name); was captured by Hannibal in 218 B. C.; became the chief town of Piedmont, and was acquired by the duke of Savoy in 1418; was occupied by the French in the first part of the 16th century, but was recovered by Savoy in 1562; was again taken by the French 1640–42, and taken by the Imperialists and Spaniards in 1706; was captured by the French in 1798, and recovered in 1799; and was retaken by the French in 1800, and restored to Sardinia in 1814. Turin played an important part in the national movements of the 19th century, and was the capital of the kingdom of Italy 1860–65. Population (1892), 330,000.

Turin, Treaties of. Two treaties between France and Savoy (in 1696.—2. An armistice negotiated by Bonaparte with Sardinia in 1796.

Turkestan (tör-kes-tän'), or Turkistan (tör-kis-tän'). ['Land of the Turks.'] A region with indefinite limits in Asia, east of the Caspian, south of Siberia, and north of Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet. The name is sometimes used in a restricted sense, and sometimes is practically limited to the western portion of this region, included chiefly in Russia and its dependencies, or to the highlands and plains (Oxus, Jaxartes) between the Aral and west of Eastern Turkestan. Population, estimated, about 8,000,000.

Turkestan, or Turkistan. A general government of Russian Central Asia, comprising the provinces Semirvetchensk, Samarkand, Sir-Daria, and Ferghana. Area, 409,414 square miles. Population, 3,313,213.

Turkey (tėr'ki), or the Ottoman Empire. [F. Turquie, it. Die Türkei, It. Turchia, Sp. Turquia: Turk, name of the empire Osmanli Ulaiet: NL. Turcia, from Turcus, Turk: see Turks.] An empire in the southeast of Europe, southwest of Asia, and northern Africa. Capital, Constantinople. It comprises the following immediate possessions: in Europe, the vilayets or divisions of Constantinople, Adrianople, Salonika, Monastir, Servia, Skutari, Janina, and Kossova; in Africa, the vilayets of Tripoli and Benghazi; and in Asia, Asia Minor (12 vilayets), Armenia and Kurdistan (5), Mesopotamia (6), and Syria and Arabia (9). It has also the following nominal possessions: the tributary principality of Samos; Cyprus (administered by Great Britain); Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Novibazar (administered by Austria-Hungary); Bulgaria with Eastern Roumelia (practically independent); and Egypt (which pays tribute). The surface is very mountainous in European Turkey, in Asia Minor, Turkish Armenia, and Kurdistan, and in western Syria. The principal occupations are agriculture and pastoral pursuits. The leading exports are raisins, silk, mohair, opium, wheat, cotton, wool, coffee, fruits, skins, oil, and valonia. The government is an absolute monarchy under the sultan as sovereign. Government is administered by the grand vizir, the Sheik-ul-Islam, and the cabinet. The leading religion is Mohammedanism; but the Greek, Roman Catholic, Armenian, Syrian, Jewish, Protestant, and Maronite creeds are also recognized by the government. The inhabitants comprise Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians, Albanians, Jews, Syrians, Arabs, etc. The nucleus of the Ottoman empire was formed early in the 13th century under Er-Toghrul in Asia Minor. The first chief ruler was Othman (1288–1326). The dominions of the Ottomans became consolidated in Asia Minor in the first part of the 14th century; and they overthrew the Servian monarchy at Kossova in 1389. Their power was extended by Bajazet I. and Murad II. Mohammed II. took Constantinople and overthrew the Byzantine empire in 1453, and conquered Trebizond, etc. The empire reached its height in the 16th century, through the conquest of Syria, Egypt, Hungary, Rhodes, etc. The Turks were repulsed before Vienna in 1683; suffered great losses from Venice, Austria, and Russia in the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th; carried on unsuccessful wars with Russia and Austria in the last part of the 18th century; had their empire invaded by the French in 1798; lost Greece 1820–29; had unsuccessful war with Russia 1828–29; and took part in the Crimean war 1853–56. Egypt meanwhile had become practically independent. Insurrections in Greece, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Servia, and Montenegro were followed by the unsuccessful war with Russia 1877–78; the independence of Rumania, Servia, and Montenegro was recognized in 1878; and Cyprus, Bulgaria, Bosnia, and Herzegovina were practically lost. Turkey was compelled to make a large cession to Greece in 1881. Eastern Rumelia was united with Bulgaria in 1885. The area of Turkey's immediate possessions is estimated at 1,147,578 square miles; the population at 27,694,000.

Turks (tėrks). 1. The race now dominant in Turkey: the Ottomans. See Ottomans.—2. In an extended sense, the members of a race regarded as related to the Mongols: a branch of the Ural-Altaic family. In this sense the Turkish race includes the Petchenegs, Uzbegs, Turkomans, Ottoman Turks, etc.

A revolt took place against the Jouan-Jouan in the beginning of the sixth century, when the Turks ex nomine are for the first time heard of in history. They founded an empire which stretched from the borders of Manchuria to the Caspian Sea, and succeeded also Transoxiana and the country as far as the Indus. Their power south of the Sihun or Jaxartes was sapped and eventually destroyed by the Arabs, who founded a great Mohammedan dynasty. The Turks remained masters of the steppes, and supplied the Samanis, and even the Khalifs, with mercenary troops whose leaders presently seized their masters' power and founded a famous Turkish dynasty at Ghazni, while somewhat later fresh hordes under their own leaders planted themselves in Khorassan and created the splendid empire of the Seljuks, who from the eleventh to the thirteenth century governed the greater part of the Khalifs' dominions in Asia, and advanced the Mohammedan rule into the mountain ranges of Anatolia, and thus prepared for the rise of the Ottomans, their successors. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 4.

Turk's Head. The name of several coffee-houses formerly in London, one of which, on the Strand, was frequented by Johnson and other celebrities of the 18th century.

Turner (tėr'nėr), Charles Tennyson. Born at Sowerby, July 4, 1808: died April 25, 1879. An English poet, brother of Alfred Tennyson.

Turner, Joseph Mallord William. Born at London, April 23, 1775: died there, Dec. 19, 1851. A famous English landscape-painter, the son of a barber in London. His education was meager, but he devoted himself to drawing at a very early age. In 1789 he entered the school of the Royal Academy, and for a short time worked with Sir Joshua Reynolds. In 1790 he exhibited a "View of the Archbishop's Palace, Lambeth," at the Royal Academy. He was made associate of the Royal Academy in 1799, and royal academician in 1802. Before the latter date he had made a profound study of perspective at the academy. He visited Scotland in 1800, and the Continent about 1802 and in 1804. In 1800 he exhibited six foreign subjects, among them the famous "Calais Pier." From 1806 to 1815 he produced his "Liber Studiorum" (which see), a rival of the "Liber Veritatis" of Claude. After 1797 his work becomes more and more imaginative. In 1813 he commenced the illustrations for Cooke's "Southern Coast." In 1818 he went to Scotland to make the illustrations for Scott's "Provincial Antiquities." In 1819 he visited Italy for the first time. The visit was followed by increased brilliancy of color, as in "The Golden Bough" and "The Fighting Temeraire." In 1819-21 he illustrated Whitaker's "History of Richmondshire," in 1824 "The Rivers of England," in 1830 Rogers's "Italy," and in 1833-35 "The Rivers of France." He developed a new school of engravers. In 1828 he again visited Italy. His first Venetian picture appeared at the academy in 1833. In 1839 he exhibited "The Fighting Temeraire," in 1840 "The Slave Ship," and in 1842 "The Burial of Wilkie at Sea." He continued to exhibit till 1850. His popular fame is due largely to the enthusiastic praise of him in the writings of Ruskin.

Turner, Sharon. Born at London, Sept. 24, 1768; died there, Feb. 13, 1847. An English historian. His chief works are a "History of the Anglo-Saxons" (4 vols. 1799–1805), and a "History of England" (1814–29).

Turnus (tėr'nus). In Roman legend, the king of the Rutulians, in Italy, at the period of the arrival of the Trojans under Æneas.

Turpin (tėr'pin; F. pron. tôr-pan'). Died about 794. An archbishop of Rheims, famous as the erroneously reputed author of a history of Charlemagne which was really composed in the 11th or 12th century.

The chronicle of the pseudo-Turpin is of little real importance in the history of French literature, because it is admitted to have been written in Latin. The busy idleness of critics has, however, prompted them to discuss at great length the question whether the "Chanson de Roland" may not possibly have been composed from this chronicle. The facts are these. Tilpin or Turpin was actually archbishop of Rheims from 753–794, but nobody pretends that the chronicle going under his name is authentic. All that is certain is that it is not earlier than 1165, and that it is probably not earlier than the middle, or at most the beginning, of the eleventh century, while the part of it which is more particularly in question is of the end of that century. "Roland" is almost certainly of the middle at latest.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 127, note.

Turpin (tėr'pin), Dick. A notorious English highwayman who was executed in 1739. The popular account of his famous ride to York on his mare "Black Bess" is not mentioned in the "Newgate Calendar," and in its original form is said to have been written by Maginn.

Turretin (F. pron. tür-tan'), or Turretini (tôr-ra-te'nē), Bénédict. Born 1588: died 1631. A Swiss Protestant theologian.

Turveydrop (tėr'vi-drop). Mr. A fatuous character, a "model of deportment," in Dickens's "Bleak House."

Tuscan Sea. A name sometimes given to the part of the Mediterranean west of Tuscany.

Tuscany (tus'ka-ni). [G. Toscana, F. Toscane, from It. Toscana, the Tuscan state, from L. Etruscus, Etruscan.] A compartimento of the kingdom of Italy, and former grand duchy, bounded by Liguria, Emilia, the Marches, Umbria, Latium, and the Mediterranean. It comprises the provinces of Florence, Lucca, Massa e Carrara, Pisa, Leghorn, Grosseto, Arezzo, and Siena. It corresponds nearly to the ancient Etruria (see Etrucia). It was ruled by the Romans, Goths, Byzantine Greeks, and Franks, and later by dukes and marquises. The celebrated margravine Matilda reigned from 1076 to 1115. Later it was disintegrated into various independent republics of Florence, Pisa, Lucca, Siena, etc., and was ultimately absorbed by Florence. It became a grand duchy under the Medici in the middle of the 16th century; passed from the house of Medici to that of Hapsburg-Lorraine in 1737, and became an Austrian "secundogeniture"; was taken by the French in 1799; was ceded as the kingdom of Etruria to Parma in 1801; was taken again by the French in 1807, and incorporated with France in 1808; was restored to the Hapsburg line in 1814; suffered from insurrectionary troubles in 1848–49; established a provisional government in 1859; and was annexed to Italy in 1860. Area of compartimento, 9,304 square miles. Population (1892), 2,288,747.

Tuscarawas (tus-ka-rā'was) River. A river in northeastern Ohio which unites with the Mohican to form the Coshocton fork of the Muskingum. Length, about 125 miles.

Tuscarora (tus-ka-rō'rā). [Pl., also Tuscaroras.] A tribe of North American Indians who lived, when first known, upon the Neuse River in North Carolina. In 1711 they rose against the colonists, and after several years of warfare were nearly destroyed; the remnant subsequently joined the Iroquois, forming the sixth tribe of that confederacy, and settling in the territory of the Oneidas in New York. Their name means "unwilling to be with others," probably referring to their early separation from the other Iroquois. They number now about 700, about equally divided between New York and Ontario. See Iroquois.

Tuscan Disquisitions. A work in five books by Cicero, dedicated to M. Brutus, consisting of conversations represented as taking place at Cicero's estate at Tusculum.

Tusculum (tus'kū-lum). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy, situated in the Alban Mountains, 15 miles southeast of Rome, near the modern Frascati. According to tradition its chief, Mamilius, was a powerful supporter of the Tarquins. Later it was allied with Rome. Under the republic and empire it contained villas of many Romans (Lucullus, Pompey, Brutus, and Cicero). It was destroyed near the end of the 12th century. Its ruins contain a Roman amphitheater and a theater. The interior of the former is reticulated masonry; the seats are supported on vaulting of brickwork. The axes of the ellipse are 246 and 156 feet. Part of the arena, 157 and 95 feet. The latter is in excellent preservation. There are 15 tiers of seats, divided by radial stairways into 30 wedges; there are three passage entrances. The orchestra remains perfect, and there is much of the stage structure.

Tuscumbia (tus-kum'bi-ą). The capital of Colbert County, Alabama, situated near the Tennessee 5 miles south of Florence. Population (1890), 2,491.

Tweed (twēd). A river in Scotland and on the boundary between Scotland and England. It rises in Peeblesshire, traverses Peebles, and Roxburgh; forms the boundary between Berwick and Northumberland; and enters the North Sea at Berwick. Among its tributaries are the Ettrick, Teviot, Till, Gala, Leader, Eden, Leet, and Whiteadder. On it are Peebles, Abbotsford, Melrose, Dryburgh Abbey, Kelso, Norham Castle, etc. Length, 97 miles.

Tweed, William Marcy. Born at New York, April 3, 1823; died there, April 12, 1878. A Democratic politician and notorious criminal. He was the son of a chair maker, and learned his father's trade. In 1852 he became an alderman; served in Congress 1853–55; was made chairman of the board of supervisors of New York city and school commissioner in 1857; was State senator 1867–71 (reelected in the latter year); and was appointed commissioner of public works for the city in 1870. He was also chairman of the executive committee of Tammany Hall and grand sachem in 1863. As the head of a group of influential politicians (Connolly, Sweeny, Hall, and others), known as the "Tweed Ring," he succeeded in getting control of the financial affairs of the city, and in robbing it of many millions of dollars. He was arrested in a civil suit in Oct. 28, 1871, and in a criminal action in December; was tried in Jan., 1873, and, the jury disagreeing, was again tried in November and sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment; was released on legal technicalities in 1875, but was committed to Ludlow Street jail in default of bail in civil suits; escaped and fled to Spain; was arrested by the Spanish authorities and returned to the United States; and was recommitted to Ludlow street jail, where he died.

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. A phrase in a satirical squib by Byrom (1691–1763) alluding to the differences between the adherents of Handel and of Bononcini. See Bandello.

Twelfth Night, or What You Will. A comedy by Shakspere, first acted in 1602 and printed in 1623.

The critics all agree that some outlines of the serious portion of "Twelfth Night" were drawn, directly or indirectly, from the Italian of Bandello. Several intermediate sources have been pointed out which he could have may have gone: and among them the English of Barnabe Rich and the French of Belleforest, either of which might well enough have been the true one. Besides these, two Italian plays have lately been discovered, severally entitled "Gl' Inganni" and "Gli Ingannati" both also founded upon Bandello, though differing considerably from each other. Hudson, Int. to Twelfth Night.

Twelve Tables. The tables on which were engraved and promulgated in Rome (451 and 450 B. C.) short and concise rules of action and of human law which were most important in the affairs of daily life. They were drawn up in large part, it seems, from the existing law, and in part as new legislation, by the decemvirs, and hence were at first called "the laws of the decemvirs." Ten were first promulgated, and two were soon added. They formed thereafter the principal basis or source of the Roman jurisprudence.

Twenty-four Parganas (pär-gä'nāz). A district in Bengal, British India, in the immediate vicinity of Calcutta. Area, 2,724 square miles. Population (1881), 1,869,859, excluding Calcutta.

Two Foscari (fos'ki-rē), The. A tragedy by Lord Byron.

Two Gentlemen of Verona, The. A comedy by Shakspere (the date of production is uncertain: variously stated to be 1591 and 1595), printed in 1623. Fleay thinks the play was produced in 1591 with text by a different hand in it, which was cut out and replaced by Shakspere's own in 1595. Parts of the story are identical with that of the shepherdess Filismena in Montemayor's "Diana," translated in manuscript by Young about 1583, and with Bandello's "Apollonius and Sylla."

Two Noble Kinsmen, The. A play produced in 1625 and published in 1634 as by Fletcher and Shakspere. It is not now supposed that Shakspere had any hand in it, but Massinger and Rowley are thought to have worked with Fletcher. Fleay suggests Beaumont with Fletcher. The story is that of Palamon and Arcite.

Two Sicilies (sis'i-liz), Kingdom of the. The united kingdom of Sicily and southern Italy. The latter, when separate, is called Sicily on this side the Faro (or Capo del Faro, the northeastern promontory of Sicily), or the kingdom of Naples. The kingdom comprised under the island of Sicily, Abruzzi and Molise, Apulia, Campania, Basilicata, and Calabria. The principal periods of union have been the 12th and 13th centuries (under the Normans, Hohenstaufens, and Charles of Anjou), 1505–1713, 1713–1806, and 1815–60. Naples was under Joseph Bonaparte 1806–08, and under Murat 1808–15. See further under Sicily.

Tyler, John. Born at Greenway, Charles City County, Va., March 29, 1790: died at Richmond, Va., Jan. 18, 1862. The tenth President of the United States. He was educated at William and Mary College: was admitted to the bar in 1809; was member of the Virginia legislature 1811–16; volunteered for the defense of Richmond in 1813; was member of Congress from Virginia 1816–21; was a member of the legislature 1823–25; was governor of Virginia 1825–27; and was United States senator from Virginia 1827–36. He opposed the tariff, the bank, and the Force Bill; and resigned in Feb., 1836, from unwillingness to obey instructions of the Virginia legislature to vote for the "expunging resolution" (which see). He received 47 electoral votes in 1836 as candidate of the "State-rights Whigs" for Vice-President; was reelected to the Virginia legislature in 1838; and was nominated by the Whigs as candidate for Vice-President in Dec., 1839, and elected in 1840. By the death of President Harrison, he became President April 4, 1841. Among the leading events of his administration were the quarrel with the Whig leaders; the final passage of the Bank Bill, notwithstanding the resignation of nearly all the cabinet in Sept., 1841; veto of the protective bill in 1842; the Ashburton treaty; and the annexation of Texas. He was nominated for President by a Democratic convention in 1844, but soon withdrew. He was made peace commissioner by President Buchanan in 1861; was president of the peace convention in Feb., 1861; was elected to the Virginia house of representatives; and became a member of the Confederate provisional congress.

Tyndale, or Tindale (tin'dal), William. Born in Gloucestershire, England, about 1484: burned at Vilvorde, near Brussels, Oct. 6, 1536. An English reformer, and translator of the Bible. He studied at Oxford and Cambridge; was ordained priest about 1521; and was for a time chaplain and domestic tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, Little Sodbury, Gloucestershire. Having exposed himself to persecution on account of his professions of sympathy with the new learning, he left England for the Continent in 1524, and after a visit to Luther at Wittenberg settled at Cologne, whence, however, he was presently expelled. He took refuge in Worms, where he published his octavo edition of the New Testament in 1525. The publication of the first quarto appeared at Marburg in 1530. His movements between 1526 and 1530 are uncertain: after 1530 he lived chiefly at Antwerp. He was arrested at the instance of Henry VIII., May 21, 1535; was imprisoned in the castle of Vilvorde, near Brussels; and after a protracted trial for heresy was strangled, Oct. 6, 1536, his body being burned at the stake. Among his other works are "Parable of the Wicked Mammon" (1527), "Obedience of a Christian Man" (1528), and "Practice of Prelates" (1530).

Tyre (tīr). [L. Tyrus, Gr. Τύρος, from Phen. (Heb.) Tsor (ṣor, modern ṣur), rock.] Next to Sidon, the oldest and most important city of Phenicia. It consisted of a town on the mainland and was the oldest part (Palætyrus), and two rocky islands directly opposite Palætyrus. These islands originally contained only the temple of Melkarth. In the beginning of the 10th century B. C. they were more settled, and they were united by Hiram, the contemporary of Solomon, by an embankment. In the 9th century B. C. it began, under its first king, Abibal, father of Hiram, to rival its neighbor city Sidon, and soon supplanted it as queen of the Phenician cities. Of its magnificence and luxury the prophet Ezekiel gives a detailed and graphic description. It established colonies in Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, Africa (Carthage), and sent out mercantile fleets to India and Brittany. Under Hiram Tyre reached the height of its prosperity and splendor. It then came into close friendly relations with Israel. Later, Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal (about 900 B. C.), whose great-granddaughter Elissa (Dido) founded Carthage (814). Tyre was often the aim of attacks by Eastern rulers. It became tributary to Assyria under Tiglath-Pileser III. (745–727 B. C.). Sinhaneserv IV. (727–722) besieged it for five years, apparently without success. Under Nebuchadnezzar it stood a siege of 13 years (585–572). Later it came under Persian supremacy. Alexander the Great reduced the city after a siege of nine months, though he did not completely destroy it. From this blow Tyre never fully recovered, but continued to flourish in a quiet manner through its manufactures of metal-work, fine textiles, and purple dye. In the Roman period Tyre was still a prosperous city, and it retained some importance also in the middle ages. Under the Crusades it often changed hands between the Christians and the Mohammedans, and was repeatedly destroyed. The modern Tur is an important town under the government of Beirut, with about 5,000 inhabitants.

Tyrian Cynosure. The constellation Ursa Minor, anciently called the Cynosure, which served as a guide to the Tyrians in their long voyages.

Tyrol (tir'ol; G. pron. tē-rōl'), or Tirol, sometimes the Tyrol, It. Tirolo (tē-rō'lō). A county in Austria-Hungary which forms with Vorarlberg a crownland in the Cisleithan division of the Austrian empire. Capital, Innsbruck. Tyrol itself is bounded by Vorarlberg, Bavaria, Salzburg, Carinthia, Italy, and Switzerland. It is traversed by the Alps, and contains the upper valleys of the Lech, Adige, and Drave, and the middle valley of the Inn. Among its chief products are dairy products, fruits, and wine (in South Tyrol). It has mines of coal, iron, lead, zinc, copper, etc. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic; most of the inhabitants are Germans, but there are also about 15,000 Ladins, and in South Tyrol over one third of the population is Italian. It has 18 representatives in the Austrian Reichsrat, and 68 members in its Landtag. Tyrol was part of the ancient Rhætia and Noricum under the Roman Empire, and later in great part a portion of Bavaria. It belonged to the empire of Charles the Great, and later to the duchy of Bavaria. The counts of Tyrol extended their power from the neighborhood of Meran in the middle ages, and became paramount in the country. Tyrol passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1363, and was granted by Napoleon to Bavaria in 1805. In 1809 occurred an insurrection against the French and Bavarian rule. Parts of Tyrol were ceded to France in 1809-10. It was recovered by Austria in 1814. Area, 11,324 square miles. Population (1890), 912,696.

Uclés (ö-klās'). A small town in the province of Cuenca, Spain, 56 miles southeast of Madrid. It was the scene of a battle between the Moors and Castilians in 1108; and here, Jan. 13, 1809, the French under Victor defeated the Spaniards.

Udaipur (ö-di-pör'), or Odeypore (ö-di-pör'). 1. A tributary native state in Rajputana, India, intersected by lat. 25° N., long. 74° E.: the ancient Meywar. It is under British protection. Area, 12,861 square miles. Population (1891), 1,844,360.—2. The capital of the state of Udaipur, and by lat. 24° 35′ N. Population, 38,314.

Udall (ū'dal), John. Died in the Marshalsea Prison, 1592. An English nonconformist, one of the writers for the Marprelate press. He published "Diotrephes" in 1588, the first answer to Bridges's "Defense of the Government Established in the Church of England for Ecclesiastical Matters," and was summoned before the Court of High Commission and finally deprived of his living and imprisoned at Southwark. He then printed in a work called "A Demonstration of the Truth of that Discipline which Christ hath Prescribed, etc." This book was declared seditious, and he was sentenced to death in Feb., 1591. Efforts were made by Sir Walter Raleigh for his release, and, though they were not successful, he was left in prison, where he died. He also wrote "The Key to the Holy Tongue," the first Hebrew grammar in English, printed at Leyden in 1593.

Udall, Nicholas. Born in Hampshire about 1505; died 1556. An English dramatist and Latin scholar. He was head-master at Eton in 1534, and of Westminster School 1553–56. He was the author of the first English comedy, "Ralph Roister Doister" (which see). In 1542 he published his translation of the "Apothemus" of Erasmus; he also (1542–45) translated Erasmus's paraphrase on Luke.

Uhland (ö'länt), Ludwig. Born at Tübingen, April 26, 1787; died there, Nov. 13, 1862. A German lyric poet. He studied jurisprudence at Tubingen, and afterward became an advocate at Stuttgart. He subsequently devoted himself to linguistic studies. In 1810 he was in Paris engaged in study, particularly of manuscripts of the middle ages. In 1829 he was made professor of the German language and literature at the University of Tübingen, a post which he, however, resigned in 1833 on the refusal of the government to grant him a leave of absence to attend the German Diet as delegate. In 1848 and 1849 he was a member of the Diet. His first poems ("Gedichte") appeared in 1806: a complete collection was published in 1815. "Vaterländische Gedichte" ("Fatherland Poems"), a volume of patriotic lyrics evoked by the Wurtemberg constitutional troubles of 1815, was published in 1816, and in an augmented edition in 1817. In 1818 appeared the first of his two dramas, the tragedy "Ernst, Herzog von Schwaben" ("Ernst, Duke of Swabia"), which was followed in 1819 by "Ludwig der Baier" ("Louis the Bavarian"). His fame as a poet is based chiefly upon his songs and ballads, some of which are among the most famous in German literature. Several of his lyrics, like "Ich hatt' einen Kameraden," "Droben stehet die Kapelle," and "Es zogen drei Burschen wohl über den Rhein," and the religious poem "Das ist der Tag des Herrn," have become genuine folk-songs. As a poet he belonged to the so-called Swabian School. His poems and dramas ("Gedichte und Dramen") were published at Stuttgart in 1876, in 3 vols. His "Schriften zur Geschichte der Dichtung und Sage" ("Writings on the History of Poetry and Legend") appeared at Stuttgart, 1865–73, in 8 vols.

Uhrich (ö'rich or ü-rēk'), Jean Jacques Alexis. Born at Pfalzburg, Alsace, Feb. 15, 1802: died at Passy, Oct. 9, 1886. A French general. He served in Spain, Algeria, the Crimea, and Italy; and was commandant of Strasburg at the time of its siege and capitulation in 1870.

Uigurs (wē'görz). A Turkish people dwelling in central Asia, especially in the Tian-Shan region. Also Uighurs.

The Uighurs eventually . . . under the names of Yuchi-shi and White Huns, broke in power the Greek Seleucid state of Bactria, and founded a famous empire, with its capital at Balkh, which became the scourge of the Sassanians on the one hand, and filled a more principal part in Indian history than is generally suspected on the other.
Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 3.

Uintah, or Uinta (ū-in'tä), Mountains. A range of mountains chiefly in northern Utah, on the borders of Colorado and Wyoming. It extends nearly east and west.

Uiracocha (wē-rä-kō'chä). [Quichua: perhaps from Uagra, air, spirit, and cocoha, sea, space.] The Supreme Deity of the ancient Peruvians. He was described as the creator of all living things. His worship had come down from very ancient times, and was attributed to the people who had ruled about Lake Titicaca (see Picaos). He was adored, at least by the amautas, or wise men, and temples were dedicated to him (see Curicancha). The festival of Cuzco Rayan, in the middle of the year, was held in his honor. The early Spanish writers corrupted the name to Viracocha and mistranslated it "foam of the sea." Uiracocha was sometimes represented as white and bearded, whence the Indians are said to have applied the name to the Spaniards. For the same reason the missionaries supposed him to be identical with the Mexican Quetzalcohuatl (which see), and imagined that the traditions of him referred to St. Thomas. Also called Illatoc-ceve (creator), Pachayachachic (teacher), and Pachacamac (ruler of the world).

Ujfalvy, Charles Eugène. Born at Vienna, May 16, 1842. A philologist, ethnologist, and traveler, of Hungarian descent. He became professor at the Oriental Academy at Paris in 1873, and made journeys to Asia (1876–82) under French auspices. He has written various works on Magyar, the Finnic and other Ural-Altaic languages, "Mission scientifique française en Russie" (1878–82), etc.

Ujiji (ö-jē'jē). 1. The country of the Jiji tribe (Wajiji), of Bantu stock, in central Africa. The natives are well built and strong, able fishermen and boatmen, agriculturists, iron-workers, and traders in ivory, palm-oil, and cattle. They are settled on the northeastern shore of Lake Tanganyika in German East Africa.

2. The chief town of the Wajiji, situated in lat. 5° S., long. 30° E., with about 8,000 population and a strong settlement of Arabs. It was here that Burton discovered the lake, and here Stanley found Livingstone on Nov. 10, 1871.

Ukaapa. See Kwapa.

Ukerewe (ö-ke-rē'). An island in the southern part of Lake Victoria Nyanza.

Ukermark, or Uckermark (ö'ker-märk). The northernmost division of the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, surrounded by Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Pomerania, the Neumark, and the Mittelmark. It is divided now into the circles Prenzlau, Templin, and Angermünde. The early inhabitants were Pohlish Slavs. It was acquired by Brandenburg chiefly in the reign of Frederick I. (1415–40).

Ukraine (ü'krān or ö-krān'). [Russ. Ukraina, border land.] A region in Russia, of vague boundaries, lying chiefly in the valley of the middle Dnieper: nearly the same as Little Russia, and corresponding nearly to the governments Kieff, Tchernigoff, Poltowa, and Kharkoff. It was long an object of contention between Poland and Russia. The part west of the Dnieper was ceded to Russia by Poland in 1667 and 1686; the part west of the Dnieper fell to Russia in 1793.

Uleåborg (ö'le-å-borg). 1. A laen of Finland, occupying the northern part of that country. Area, 63,971 square miles. Population, 246,963. —2. A seaport, capital of the laen of Uleåborg, situated at the north of the Uleå-Elf in the Gulf of Bothnia, in lat. 65° 2′ N., long. 24° 34′ E. It has considerable foreign commerce. Population, 10,589.

Uleå Lake (ö'le-å läk). A lake in Finland, southeast of Uleåborg. Length, about 40 miles.

Ulfilas (ul'fi-las), Goth. Wulfila ('little wolf'). Born at Dacia; died at Constantinople in 381. A Gothic bishop and translator of the Bible. His parents were Christians of Cappadocian origin. At the Synod of Antioch, 341, he was consecrated bishop of the Arian Visigoths, who lived to the north of the lower Danube. In 348, persecuted and driven out of this region by Athanarich, Ulfilas and his people, with the permission of the emperor Constantius, emigrated to Mœsia, in the neighborhood of Nicopolis. From their new home they are consequently frequently called Mœsogoths and their language Mœsogothic. Ulfilas died at Constantinople, where he had gone to defend the doctrines of Arianism. He preached in Greek, Latin, and Gothic. He translated the Bible into Gothic from a Greek original, but is said to have omitted the Books of Kings. For his translation he invented a written alphabet by supplementing the Greek alphabet in necessary instances from the Gothic runes. His translation, which from internal evidence shows the work of several hands, and was revised, in part done by others under his supervision, has been preserved only in a fragmentary form: in all there are the greater part of the Gospels, a large portion of the Epistles, and scraps of the Old Testament. The principal manuscript is the so-called Codex Argenteus of the University Library at Upsala, Sweden, written in silver letters on a purple ground. Fragments of other manuscripts are preserved at Wolfenbüttel, Germany, and at Milan and Turin. The Gothic translation of the Bible is the oldest extant literary monument in the Germanic languages. It has been many times published. A recent edition is by E. Bernhardt ("Vulfila oder die Gotische Bibel," Halle, 1875).

The grammar of the Gothic tongue, as exhibited in the translation of Ulfilas, is in handle be said, of priceless value in the history of human speech. We here see, not indeed the original of all the Teutonic languages, but a specimen one of them the centuries earlier than any other that has been preserved, with many inflections which have since been lost, with words which give us the clue to relationships otherwise untraceable, with phrases which cast a strong light on the fresh and joyous youth of the Teutonic peoples. In short, it is not too much to say that the same place which the study of Sanscrit holds in the history of the development of the great Indo-European family of nations is occupied by the Gothic of Ulfilas (Mœso-Gothic, as it is sometimes not very happily named) in reference to the unwritten history of the Germanic race.

Ullmann (ōl'man), Karl. Born at Epfenbach, near Heidelberg, March 15, 1796; died at Karlsruhe, Baden, Jan. 12, 1865. A German Protestant evangelical theologian. His works include "Ueber Reformen" (1841), "Reformatoren vor der Reformation," 1841), "Über die Sündlosigkeit Christi" ("On the Sinlessness of Christ," 1841), "Das Wesen des Christenthums" (1845), a reply to Strauss's "Life of Jesus," entitled "Historisch oder mythisch?"

Ulloa (ōl-yō'ä), Antonio de. Born at Seville, Jan. 12, 1716; died near Cadiz, July 3, 1795. A Spanish naval officer. In 1735 he was chosen, with Jorge Juan, another young naval officer, to accompany to Peru the French commission for the measurement of an arc of the meridian. (See Condamine.) While there they studied the natural features and political condition of the colony, and were also employed in defending it against Lord Anson. During his return voyage in 1744–45, Ulloa was captured by the English, but soon released. Charles III. gave him high naval and civil offices, including the governorship of Louisiana (1766–68), but he showed little aptitude for command, and after 1780 was not in active service. He founded the observatory at Cadiz and the first Spanish metallurgical laboratory, and was prominent in other scientific enterprises. He published "Relacion histórica del viage a la América meridional" (with Juan; 2 vols., 1748, translated into various languages), "Noticias Americanas" (1772), etc. The secret report of Juan and Ulloa on the American colonies was published in English in 1826; it is important as showing the causes which led to the war for independence.

Ulloa, Francisco de. Died in 1540 (?). A Spanish captain. He was with Cortés in the conquest of Mexico, and in July, 1539, was sent by him to explore the Gulf of California. He left Acapulco with three vessels one of which was lost in a storm: with the others he ascended to the head of the gulf, subsequently exploring the western coast of the peninsula, and attaining about lat. 28°, or, as some assert, lat. 30 or 30 N. One account says that he was lost at sea; another that he was assassinated shortly after his return to Acapulco. Ulloa was the first to prove that Lower California was a peninsula.

Ullswater, or Ulleswater (ulz'wâ'tėr). A lake on the border between Cumberland and Westmoreland, England, 20 miles south of Carlisle: the second in size of the English lakes. Its outlet is the Eamont into the Eden. Length, 9 miles.

Ulm (ōlm). The chief town of the Danube circle of Würtemberg, and an imperial fortress, situated at the junction of the Iller and Blau with the Danube, in lat. 48° 24′ N., long. 9° 59′ E. It is an important strategic and railway center, has active trade in leather, wood, cloth, etc.; has manufactures of beer, pipe-bowls, metal-work, hats, etc.; and is noted for its cathedral. Its cathedral, the largest church in Germany except the cathedral of Cologne, was begun in 1377, and finished early in the 16th century. The west front has a splendid triple portal sculptured in rich lower terminating in an octagon and a spire 529 feet high, completed in 1890, and forming the loftiest stone structure in the world. The interior has double aisles, and much fine church furniture. The 15th-century choir stalls of oak are covered with remarkable figure-sculpture, illustrating paganism, Judaism, and Christianity. There is also splendid glass. The cathedral measures 420 by 165 feet; height of nave vault, 141. Ulm was a free imperial city; was one of the chief places in Swabia, and a leading member of the Swabian leagues; joined the Reformation in 1530; and passed to Bavaria in 1803, and to Würtemberg in 1809. Population (1890), 36,391.

Ulm, Capitulation of. The surrender of an Austrian army (about 25,000–30,000) under Mack to Napoleon, Oct. 17, 1805.

Ulpian (ul'pi-an), L. Ulpianus (ul-pi-ā'nus), Domitius. Murdered about 228 A. D. A celebrated Roman jurist, of Phenician descent. He held office from the time of Septimius Severus; was banished by Elagabalus; and was pretorian prefect under Alexander Severus. He wrote many commentaries and other legal works. "Ad Sabinum," "Ad Sabinum, etc.," largely used in the "Digest." Fragments of his "Institutiones" were published by Endlicher in 1835.

Although Ulpian's chief merit lies rather in the collation of what was known than in the well-balanced arrangement of the same, his works enjoyed for a long time high authority on account of their rich contents, and this, too, in the time of their greatest activity and clear style. In Justinian's Digest the extracts from his works form a full third of the whole work.

Umbria (um'bri-ä). [L. Umbria, Gr. Ὀμβρία or Ὀμβρική, from Umbri, Gr. Ὄμβροι, Ὀμβρικοί, or Ὀμβρικοί, the inhabitants.] In ancient geography, a region in Italy, situated east of Etruria and west of Picenum. The Umbrians took part in the second Samnite war, but were defeated by Rome in 308 B. C. After the third Samnite war they were gradually Romanized. Modern Umbria is a compartment of the kingdom of Italy. It contains the province Perugia.

The Umbria of Herodotus, as Niebuhr observes (Hist. of Rome, vol. i., p. 142 E. T.), "is of large and indefinite extent." It appears to include almost the whole of Northern Italy. It is from the region above the Umbrians that the Alpis and the Carpis flow into the Danube (iv. 49). This would seem to assign to them the modern Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and to place them on the Adriatic. The arrival of the Tyrrhenians on their shores extends them to the opposite coast, and makes Tuscany also a part of their country. Herodotus knows of no Italian nations except the Tyrrhenians, the Umbrians, the Venetians (Veneti), the Œnotrians, and the Messapians.

Umbriel (um'bri-el). [Formed from L. umbra, shade, and -iel as in Ariel, Gabriel.] A dusky sprite in Pope's "Rape of the Lock."

Umbriel. The second satellite of Uranus, discovered by Herschel in 1787.

Umbundu (öm-bön'dö). The language of the Ovimbundu (sing. Ochimbundu), who are settled between Benguella (Bangela), West Africa, and the Kuangu River, due east. The two principal tribes are those of Bailundu (Bailoondoo) and Bihe (Bye). As these people are traveling traders who have opened the Zambesi valley, Katanga, Urua, and Lubuku to the commerce of Benguella, the language is understood far beyond its tribal territory. In interior it belongs to the same cluster as Ndonga and Herero. It should not be confounded with Kimbundu (which see). American missionaries are developing a strong Umbundu literature.

Umeå-Elf (ö'me-å elf). A river in Sweden which flows into the Gulf of Bothnia near Umeå: the outlet of various lakes, including Stor Uman. Length, 261 miles.

Ummerapoora. See Amarapura.

Umon (ö-mōn'). An African town, built on an island in the Benue or Old Kalabar River, West Africa, about 70 miles from its mouth. It is an important market where the tribes of the upper river come to barter their produce for European goods brought up by the Efik traders of the coast. Population, about 8,000.

Umpqua (ump'kwä). A river in Oregon which flows into the Pacific Ocean about lat. 43° 40′ N. Length, about 180 miles.

Uncle Remus. See Remus, Uncle.

Uncle Sam (sam). The government of the people of the United States: a jocular extension of the initials U. S.

Uncle Tom's Cabin. A novel by Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, published in book form in 1852. It was directed against negro slavery in the Southern States. The scene is laid chiefly in Kentucky and Louisiana. It has appeared in numerous editions and translations.

It came out as a sort of feuilleton in the "National Era," a Washington paper. The death of Uncle Tom was the first portion published, indeed the first that was written. It appeared in the summer of 1851, and excited so much attention that Mrs. Stowe added a beginning and middle to her end, by composing and printing from week to week the story as we now have it, until it was concluded in March, 1852. Before the end of 1852 it had been translated into Italian, Spanish, Danish, Swedish, Dutch, Flemish, German, Polish, and Magyar. There are two Dutch translations and twelve German ones; and the Italian translation enjoys the honour of the pope's prohibition. It has been dramatised in twenty forms, and acted in every capital in Europe, and in the free States of America.

Uniformity Act. In English history: (a) An act of Parliament, passed in 1549, which provided for uniformity of religious service. (b) An act of Parliament passed May 19, 1662. It obliged holders of church livings to be ordained by a bishop; to assent to the Prayer-book; to renounce the Covenant; to declare the unlawfulness of bearing arms against the sovereign; and to make oath of canonical obedience. Many clergymen resigned their benefices.

Unigenitus Dei Filius (ū-ni-jen'i-tus dē'i fil'i-us). [L., 'Only-begotten Son of God.'] A bull promulgated by Pope Clement XI. in 1713, in which the Jansenists were condemned.

Union (ū'nyon), The. 1. The United States of America.—2. Same as Union, Act of, 3.

Union, Act of. 1. A statute of 1535–36, which enacted the political union of Wales to England.—2. A statute of 1706, which united the kingdoms of England and Scotland on and after May 1, 1707.—3. A statute of 1800, which united the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland on and after Jan. 1, 1801.

Unionists (ū'nyon-ists). In British politics, those who are opposed to the dissolution or rupture of the legislative union existing between Great Britain and Ireland, and especially to the separatist principles and tendencies of those who desire to establish home rule in Ireland: a name applied to the Conservatives and Liberal-Unionists.

Union Jack. The national ensign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, used in a small form as a jack—that is, displayed at the end of the bowsprit. The name "union jack" has come wrongly to be applied to the finger-union flag itself. It is formed by the union of the cross of St. George (red on a white field), the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Andrew (white on a blue field), and the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Patrick (red on a white field). The jack is not flown on shore.

Union League Club. A social and political (Republican) club, organized in New York city in 1863, and incorporated in 1865. Its stated objects at the time of its organization during the War of the Rebellion were "to promote, encourage, and sustain, by all proper means, absolute and unqualified loyalty to the government of the United States; to discountenance and repulse, by moral and social influences, all disloyalty to said government, and every attempt against the integrity of the Nation;" and also to establish a library and gallery for the collection of literature, works of art, and military trophies relating to the war. House, Fifth Avenue and 30th street. Similar clubs were formed in other cities.

Union Square. A public park in New York city, between Broadway, Fourth Avenue, 14th street, and 17th street. In 1806 it was a potter's field. It was made a public park in 1815.

Uniontown (ū'nyon-toun). The capital of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, 42 miles south by east of Pittsburg. Population (1890), 6,359.

United States (ū-nī'ted stāts), or United States of America. [F. États-Unis, G. Vereinigte Staaten, It. Stati Uniti, Sp. Estados Unidos, D. Verecnigde Staten.] A federal republic which occupies the principal part of central North America. Capital, Washington. Excluding the detached district of Alaska, it is bounded by British America on the north, the Atlantic on the east, Florida Strait, the Gulf of Mexico, and Mexico on the south, and the Pacific on the west. The great physical divisions are the Atlantic slope, Appalachian system, central plain (including the Mississippi valley and the Great Lakes basin), Rocky Mountain system, western plateau, Sierra Nevada and Cascade systems, and Pacific slope. The principal rivers are the Mississippi (with the Missouri, Ohio, etc.), St. Lawrence, Rio Grande, Colorado, and Columbia; the principal lakes the group known as "the great lakes" (partly in Canada), Great Salt Lake, and Lake Champlain. The leading agricultural products are corn (of which, in 1895, 1,919,480,000 bushels were produced), wheat (530,149,000 bushels), oats (638,855,000 bushels), sugar (estimated, 1893: cane, 450,000,000 pounds; beet, 27,085,322; sorghum, 986,000; maple, 3,30,000), cotton (1899, 7,462,281 bales), tobacco (1895, 483,023,965 pounds), rye, rice, dairy products, live stock, hay, and potatoes. The metallic products for 1893 are iron (91,587,630 tons), silver (60,000,000 ounces), gold (1,739,081 ounces), copper (329,354,398 pounds), lead (163,982 short tons), zinc (78,832 short tons), quicksilver (30,164 flasks: 76½ pounds to a flask), nickel (49,299 pounds), aluminium (233,629 pounds), and platinum (1895, platinum (75 ounces); other products are coal (162,814,977 long tons), petroleum (48,412,666 barrels), natural gas, mineral waters, etc. Manufactures are greatly diversified. The principal exports are breadstuffs, cotton, provisions, petroleum, Indian corn, tobacco, sugar, lumber, oil-cake, leather, machinery, cattle, furs. The country is first in the world in the production of steel, pig-iron, cotton, wheat, and Indian corn, and ranks among the first in tobacco and sugar. It has no universally recognized system of grouping the States of the Union: they are often classified as New England States, Middle States, Southern States (including the subdivision Gulf States), Western States (including Lake States and "the Northwest"), and Pacific States. The following is an accepted arrangement—North Atlantic division: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania. South Atlantic division: Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida (with the District of Columbia). North Central division: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas. South Central division: Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas (with the Territory of Oklahoma). Western division: Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, and Idaho (with the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico).—In all, 45 States and 3 Territories, besides the District of Columbia (which contains Washington, the capital, and is administered by the Federal government), the unorganized Indian Territory, and the civil and judicial district of Alaska. The largest cities are New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn. The Federal executive power is vested in a President, elected for 4 years by an electoral college which is elected by the votes of the people of the different States. He is assisted by a cabinet of 8 members of his own appointment. The legislative authority is vested in Congress, which consists of a Senate, whose members of which are returned by each State, and a House of Representatives, at present (1894) of 356 members, returned by the States in the proportion of one for about every 174,000 inhabitants. The separate States have extensive independent powers reserved to them under the Constitution of the republic. The State governments are administered each by a governor and a legislature of two houses. There are distinct Federal and State judicial systems, the highest court in the land being the United States Supreme Court. The inhabitants are largely of British descent; about 8,500,000 are colored. There are many immigrants and descendants of recent immigrants from Germany, Norway, Sweden, Italy, Bohemia, Poland, Hungary, etc., and Japanese and Chinese. The prevailing language is English; German, Canadian French, etc., are largely spoken in certain localities. All religions are tolerated, and in a population so diversified origin all may be said to have adherents. The largest of the Protestant denominations are the Methodists and Baptists. The region is said to have been visited and temporarily colonized by the Northmen about A. D. 1000, was seen by the Cabots in 1497–98, and explored by Ponce de Leon in 1513–14, Verrazano in 1524, De Soto in 1539–41, and others. The first permanent settlement was made at St. Augustine in 1565. Thirteen colonies were planted, which by their union in 1783 formed the thirteen original States: Virginia (1607), Massachusetts (1620), New Hampshire (1623), Maryland (1634), Connecticut (1635), Rhode Island (1636), North Carolina, South Carolina, Pennsylvania (1682), and Georgia (1733), all by the British; New York and New Jersey by the Dutch; and Delaware (1638) by Swedes. Among the wars carried on with the Indians were the Pequot war, King Philip's war, King William's war, Queen Anne's war, King George's war, and the French and Indian war. The chief following are among the leading events of United States history: Revolution hastened by the Stamp Act of 1765, taxes in 1767, and the Boston Port Bill of 1774; commencement of the Revolutionary War, 1775 (see Revolutionary War); Declaration of Independence, 1776; surrender at Yorktown, 1781; recognition of independence, 1783; Articles of Confederation adopted, 1777–81; Ordinance of 1787 relating to the Northwest Territory; Constitution formed, 1787; new form of government adopted, 1789, with the capital at New York; capital removed to Philadelphia, 1790; Indian war, 1790–1794; French war, 1798–1800; capital transferred to Washington, 1800; Tripolitan war, 1802–05; Louisiana Purchase, 1803; embargo, 1807; war with Great Britain, 1812–15; cession of Florida by Spain, 1819; financial crisis, 1837; annexation of Texas, 1845; Mexican war, 1846–48; acquisition of territory from Mexico, 1848, and by the Gadsden Purchase, 1853; financial crisis, 1857; secession of eleven States, 1860–61; Civil War, 1861–65 (see Civil War); reconstruction in the South, 1865–77; purchase of Alaska from Russia, 1867; financial crisis, 1873; disputed presidential election, 1876–77. Area, 3,025,600 square miles; including Alaska, 3,557,000 square miles. Population (1890), 62,622,250 (estimated for July 1, 1894, 68,207,000).

United States. An American frigate, built at Philadelphia in 1797, which, under the command of Decatur, captured the British frigate Macedonian, Oct. 25, 1812, in lat. 29° N., long. 29° 30′ W.

Universal Doctor, The, L. Doctor Universalis (dok'tor ū'ni-vėr-sā'lis). A name given to Thomas Aquinas, and also to Alain de Lille.

Université Nationale de France. An institution which virtually includes the entire educational system of France. The organization of the old University of Paris has been destroyed by the Revolution, certain "écoles centrales" appeared at various points in the country. These were abolished by Napoleon, and the whole machinery of national and public instruction was reconstructed on a grand scale. The university (originally and in later imperial times called the "Université Impériale de France") includes the faculties of law, theology, medicine, letters, and science, which replace the old universities at Paris and other cities, each academy being responsible to a central governing body.

University College. A non-sectarian London college, founded in 1828. It is situated on Gower street. Opposite is the University College Hospital, the patients of which are treated by the professors of medicine of the college. In 1881 additions were made to the main building. There are about 40 professors and 1,600 students. There is connected with it a school for boys. Near here, in Gordon Square, is University Hall, a Unitarian university settlement.

University College. The oldest college of Oxford University. According to an apparently baseless tradition, it was founded by King Alfred in 872. It doubtless originated in a fund bequeathed by William, archdeacon of Durham, in 1249; and the college was practically established in 1280. The foundation now (1894) consists of a master, 13 fellows, 17 scholars, and 12 exhibitioners.

Unkiar-Skelessi (ön'kē-är-skā-les'sē), or Hunkiar-Skelessi. A small place in Asia Minor, near Constantinople, where, in 1833, Russia and Turkey concluded a treaty favorable to the former.

Unterseen (ön'ter-sā-en). A village in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated between the Lakes of Thun and Brienz, near Interlaken.

Unterwalden (ön'ter-väl-den). [G., 'lower forest.'] One of the Forest Cantons of Switzerland, bounded by Lucerne, the Lake of Lucerne, Uri, and Bern. It comprises the two half-cantons Nidwald and Obwald. The surface is mountainous; highest point, the Titlis. The chief towns are Stanz and Sarnen; the language is German; the religion Roman Catholic. It has two representatives in the National Council. Unterwalden united with the other Forest Cantons in the leagues of the 12th and 13th centuries. It was assigned to the canton of Waldstatten in 1798; the resistance of Nidwald was suppressed by the French. It was restored to its former position in 1803, and again in 1815 (resistance of Nidwald suppressed by Confederate troops in 1815), and joined the Sonderbund. Area, 295 square miles. Population (1888), 27,383.

Unyoro (ö-nyō'rō). A kingdom of British East Africa, just north of the equator, between Uganda and Lake Albert. It is still entirely independent of European control. The ruling native tribe, the Wanyoro, are kinsmen of the Ganda tribe, but less powerful and less progressive. See Nyoro.

Upanishads (ö-pa-ni-shadz'). [Skt., from upa, unto, ni, down, and √sad, to sit; and so, literally, 'a sitting down near,' 'setting oneself at the feet of another,' 'confidential communication,' 'esoteric doctrine.'] With the Aranyakas, the oldest speculative treatises of the Hindus. They lie at the root of the philosophical side of Hinduism, and not only are they viewed as shruti, or revelation, equally with the Mantras and Brahmanas, but they are practically the only Veda of all educated Hindus at the present day. Properly each Brahmana had its Aranyakas, or 'forest treatises,' intended for the Vanaprasthas, or 'dwellers in the forest' (that is, Brahmans who, having passed the two earlier stages of the brahmacharin, or student, and the grihasthin, or householder, retire into the forest to devote themselves to self-mortification and religious meditation); but the mystical doctrines of the latter were so mingled with extraneous matter that the chapters called Upanishads sprang up, to have been added to investigate more exclusively and definitely such problems as the origin of the universe, the nature of deity, the nature of the soul, and the connection of spirit and matter. Some of the most important are the Aitareya Upanishad and the Kaushitakibrahmana Upanishad of the Rigveda; the Taittiriya belonging to the Taittiriyasanhita of the Yajurveda; the Brihadaranyaka attached to the Shatapathabrahmana of the Vajasaneyisanhita of that Veda, and the Isha or Ishavasya, forming the 40th chapter of the latter Sanhita; the Chhandogya and Kena belonging to the Samaveda; and the Prashna, Mundaka, Mandukya, and Katha belonging to the Atharvaveda. Following the stratification-theory principle, in general the only guide in determining the age of Sanskrit works, the ancient Upanishads (that is, those which occupy a place in the Sanhitas, Brahmanas, and Aranyakas) are believed to be older than 600 B. C., or anterior to Buddhism, though the germs of the doctrines contained in them are to be found in some of the latest hymns. The others range through a long period, and are very numerous. The ancient Vedic literature first became known outside of India through these Upanishads. They were translated from Sanskrit into Persian by or for Dara Shikoh, the eldest son of the Mogul emperor Shah Jehan, who held the liberal religious views of Akbar. He had heard of the Upanishads in Kashmir in 1640, invited several pandits to Delhi to assist in their translation, and finished the work in 1657. Translated into Persian, then the most widely read language of the East, they became generally accessible. In 1775 a manuscript of this Persian translation was sent by the French resident at the court of Shuja ud Daula to Anquetil Duperron, the discoverer of the Avesta; and later another manuscript. Anquetil Duperron collated the two, and translated the work into French and into Latin, publishing the latter version in 1801 and 1802 under the title of Oupnekhat, a corruption of Upanishad. This Latin translation was studied by Schopenhauer. Twelve of them are translated by Max Müller, with introductions and notes, in the "Sacred Books of the East," I. and XV.

Upernavik (ö'per-nä-vik'). The northernmost Danish district in Greenland, situated on the western side. Position of the chief settlement, lat. 72° 48′ N., long. 55° 54′ W.

Upham (up'am), Charles Wentworth. Born at St. John, N. B., May 4, 1802; died at Salem, Mass., June 14, 1875. An American Unitarian clergyman, author, and politician. He was a Whig member of Congress from Massachusetts 1853–55. His works include "Lectures on Witchcraft, comprising a History of the Salem Delusion" (1831, enlarged 1867), and lives of Sir Henry Vane, J. C. Frémont, and Timothy Pickering.

Upsala (up-sä'lä). 1. A laen in eastern Sweden. Area, 2,053 square miles. Population, (1892), 121,614.—2. The capital of the laen of Upsala, situated on the river Fyris in lat. 59° 51′ N., long. 17° 38′ E. It is the seat of a noted university and of an archbishopric. The university was founded by Gustavus in 1477. It has a library of 250,000 volumes, collections of coins and minerals, botanic garden and museum, observatory, etc. The cathedral was founded in 1260, but much has been added and changed in the different centuries. The dimensions are 359 by 103 feet; length of transepts, 136; height of vaulting, 90. The two west towers have reached only about half of their projected height of 388 feet. The side portals and the exterior of the choir are exceedingly fine. Near Upsala was the medieval city Old Upsala, one of the oldest in the country. Population (1892), 21,106.

Upshur (up'shėr), Abel Parker. Born in Northampton County, Va., June 17, 1790; killed on the Potomac, Feb. 28, 1844. An American politician, secretary of the navy 1841–43, and secretary of state 1843–44.

Upton (up'ton). Emory. Born at Batavia, Genesee County, N. Y., Aug. 27, 1839; died at San Francisco, March 14, 1881. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1861; served in the Army of the Potomac and in Georgia and Alabama during the civil war, attaining the rank of brigadier-general in 1864, and was commandant of cadets at West Point 1875–76. He wrote "A System of Infantry Tactics" (1867), "Armies of Asia and Europe" (1878), etc.

Ur (ėr). The place (in Gen. Ur Kasdim, Ur of the Chaldeans) from which Abraham set out on his journey to Canaan. It has been identified with Ura which figures in the cuneiform inscriptions as the oldest capital of Babylonia and at the same time as an important maritime and commercial city. It is now represented by the ruins of Mugheir on the right bank of the Euphrates. It was the principal seat of worship of the moon-god Sin, and is therefore sometimes qualified in the inscriptions as the "moon city."

Urabá (ö-rä-bä'). Gulf of. An old name for the Gulf of Darien: generally restricted to the southern arm which receives the river Atrato.

Ural (ö'ral or ü'ral). A river which rises in the Ural Mountains, flows southwest and south, and empties by a delta into the northern end of the Caspian Sea. It forms for a large part of its course part of the conventional boundary between Europe and Asia. Length, about 1,000 miles; navigable for large vessels from Orenburg.

Ural Mountains. A collection of mountain-ranges situated mainly on the border between Europe and Asia, and in Russian territory. They extend from the Arctic Ocean southward to near lat. 51° N. The chief divisions are the Polar, Subpolar, Northern Urals (or Oblouski), Middle Urals, and Southern Urals. They are famous for their mineral wealth (gold, iron, copper, platinum, and precious stones). Highest peak (Tepes), 5,540 feet.

Uralsk (ö-rälsk'). 1. A province belonging to the governor-generalship of the Kirghiz Steppes, Russia, lying between Astrakhan and Turgai. Area, 139,168 square miles. Population (1889), 559,552.—2. The capital of Uralsk, situated at the junction of the Tchagan with the Ural, about lat. 51° 10′ N. Population, 26,054.

Urania (ü-rā'ni-ä). [NL., from L. Urania, from Gr. Οὐρανία, one of the Muses, lit. 'the Heavenly One.'] 1. In Greek mythology, the Muse of astronomy and celestial forces, and the arbitress of fate, second only to Calliope in the company of the Muses. Her usual attributes are a globe, which she carries in her hand, and a little staff or compass for indicating the course of the stars. 2. An asteroid (No. 30) discovered by Hind at London, July 22, 1854.

Uranienborg (ö-rä'ne-en-borg). A castle on the island of Hven, Sweden, the seat of the observatory of Tycho Brahe.

Uranus (ü'ra-nus). [L., from Gr. Οὐρανός, a personification of heaven, equivalent to Skt. Varuna, a deity of the highest rank in the Veda, later a god of the waters.] 1. In classical mythology, the son of Gæa or Ge (the Earth), and by her the father of the Titans, Cyclopes, etc. He hated his children, and confined them in Tartarus. He, on the instigation of Gæa, Cronus, the youngest of the Titans, overthrew and dethroned him. 2. In astronomy, the outermost but one of the planets, appearing to the naked eye as a faint star. It was discovered as a moving body with a disk, March 13, 1781, by Sir W. Herschel; but had previously been observed twenty times as a star by different observers. These are called the ancient observations of Uranus. The planet, seen with a telescope of the first class, appears as a small bluish disk with two bands. It is a little smaller than Neptune, its diameter being 31,000 miles; its mass is $\frac{1}{2300}$ of that of the sun, or 14.7 times that of the earth; its density therefore is about 1.4, being a little more than that of Jupiter. It is about 19.2 times as far from the sun as the earth is; and its period of revolution is about 84 years and a week. It has four satellites — Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon — of which the first two are extremely difficult telescopic objects. They revolve in one plane, nearly perpendicular to that of the planet.

Urban (ėr'ban) I. [L. Urbanus, of the city; It. Urbano, F. Urbain.] Bishop of Rome 222–230.

Urban II. (Odo or Eudes). Born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, France; died 1099. Pope 1088–99. He continued the policy of Gregory VII. against lay investiture and in opposition to Henry IV.; excommunicated Philip I. of France; and furthered the first Crusade.

Urban III. (Uberto Crivelli). Pope 1185–87. He opposed the emperor Frederick I.

Urban IV. (Jacques Pantaléon). Pope 1261–1264. He opposed Manfred of Sicily.

Urban V. (Guillaume de Grimoard). Born in southern France; died 1370. Pope 1362–70.

Urban VI. (Bartolommeo Prignani). Pope 1378–89. The papal schism began in his reign: the cardinals elected Clement VII. antipope.

Urban VII. (Giovanni Battista Castagna). Pope in 1590, for 13 days.

Urban VIII. (Maffeo Barberini). Born at Florence, 1568; died 1644. Pope 1623–44. He annexed the duchy of Urbino, and supported the policy of France in the Thirty Years' War.

Urban, Sylvanus. The pseudonym of the editor of the "Gentleman's Magazine."

Urbino (ör-bē'nō). [L. Urbinum Metaurense, Mt. Urbinum.] A city in the province of Pesaro e Urbino, Italy, situated on a hill in lat. 43° 44′ N., long. 12° 38′ E.: the capital of the former duchy of Urbino, and a celebrated center of art and literature in the 15th and 16th centuries. It was the birthplace of Raphael. It contains a cathedral and a ducal palace, and is the seat of an archbishop, and formerly of a university. The ducal palace is one of the finest examples of the simple central or early Renaissance style, light in proportions and richly ornamented. The south front has three superimposed loggie, and two machicolated cylindrical flanking towers. The court, with two stories and an attic, the lower story arcaded, is celebrated. The subordinate apartments are well proportioned, and decorated with sculptured arabesques, foliage, etc. Population (1881), 5,387; commune, 16,872.

Urbino, Duchy of. A former duchy comprising Urbino, Pesaro, and other places in their vicinity. It was ruled by princes of the Montefeltro family, and later was under the house of Della Rovere. It was annexed by the Papal States in 1631, and by Victor Emanuel in 1860.

Ure (ūr), Andrew. Born at Glasgow, 1778; died at London, June 2, 1857. A Scottish chemist, professor of chemistry and natural history at the Andersonian institution in Glasgow. He published "Dictionary of Chemistry" (1821), "A New System of Geology" (1829), "Philosophy of Manufactures" (1835), "Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines" (1837–39; revised by Hunt), etc.

Urfé (ür-fē'). Honoré D'. Born at Marseilles, 1567; died in 1625. A French writer. He was of a noble family, and seems to have been intended for the church. A mercurial temperament in all its circumstances drove him into retirement, where he composed his "Astrée" (which see), as the author of which he is usually known. He was a voluminous pastoral and amatory writer.

Urganda (ör-gän'dä). A fairy and enchantress in the legend of Amadis de Gaul.

Urgel (ör-hel'). A town in the province of Lerida, Spain, situated on the Segre 74 miles north-northwest of Barcelona. It is the seat of a bishop who, conjointly with France, supervises the republic of Andorra.

Uri (ö'ri; G. pron. ö'rē). One of the Forest Cantons of Switzerland, bounded by the Lake of Lucerne, Schwyz, Glarus, Grisons, Ticino, Valais, Bern, and Unterwalden. Capital, Altorf. It is traversed by the Reuss and by the St.-Gothard Railway. The language is chiefly German but Italian also is spoken, the religion, Roman Catholic. Uri sends one representative to the National Council. It united in leagues with other Forest Cantons in the 13th and 14th centuries, conquered the Val Leventina in the 15th century; was assigned to the canton Waldstätten in 1798; was the scene of many conflicts in 1799; became a canton in 1803. Without the Val Leventina, and joined the Sonderbund. Area, 415 square miles. Population (1888), 17,249.

Uri, Bay of or Lake of, or Urner See (ör'ner sā). The southeastern arm of the Lake of Lucerne, Switzerland. Length, 5 miles. It is bordered by high mountains (Rütli, Axenstrasse).

Uriah (ū-rī'ä). [Heb., 'Yahveh is my light.'] A Hittite officer in the army of David, husband of Bathsheba; killed by order of David.

Urian (ū'ri-an; G. pron. ö'rē-än). Sir. A name formerly used to designate an unknown person, or one whose name, even if known, it was not thought proper to mention. In this sense it was sometimes applied to the devil. In the "Parival" of Waltran von Eschenbach, the unprincipled Prince of Punturtois is called Urian. Beyond Taylor, Notes to Faust, sc. xxi.

Uricconium (ū-ri-kō'ni-um), or Viroconium (vir-ō-kō'ni-um). An ancient town in Britain, on the site of the modern Wroxeter, near Shrewsbury.

Uriel (ū'ri-el). [Heb., 'light of God.'] One of the seven archangels. He is spoken of in 2 Esdras as the good angel. He has been conceived to be an angel of light, and his station to be in the sun. He is introduced by Milton in "Paradise Lost," and by Longfellow in the "Golden Legend."

Urner Loch. A tunnel in the St. Gotthard Pass, Switzerland, between the Devil's Bridge and Andermatt.

Urner See (ör'ner sā). Same as Uri, Bay of.

Urquhart (ėrk'härt), David, Born in the county of Cromarty, Scotland, 1805; died 1877. A British publicist and politician. He was a Conservative member of Parliament. He published "Observations on Europe as to Turkey" (1833), "Turkey and its Resources" (1833), "Spirit of the East" (1838), "Pillars of Hercules" (1848), "The Lebanon" (1860), and various works against Russia, the United States, on French affairs, etc.

Urquhart, or Urchard (ėrch'ärd), Sir Thomas. Born about 1605: died 1660. A Scottish Royalist and author. He possessed estates in Cromarty; was educated at King's College, Aberdeen; and traveled, having a good knowledge of foreign tongues. He was declared a rebel by Parliament; took arms on the king's side; fought in the battle of Worcester; and, though sent a prisoner to London, had some liberty. He escaped, and died in Paris. He published several works, but is best known from his translation of Rabelais (1653).

Urquiza (ör-kē'thä), Justo José. Born near Concepcion del Uruguay, Entre Rios, March 19, 1800; assassinated on his estate at San José, near the same place, April 11, 1871. An Argentine general and politician. As a country shopkeeper he acquired great influence over the Gauchos, and in 1844–45, with an army of 4,000 of them, assisted the Argentine insurgents under Rivadavia, defeating Rivera at India Muerta, March 28, 1845. In 1846 he was elected governor of Entre Rios. The loose federative system then in vogue in the Argentine gave practically unlimited powers to the governors or dictators. Urquiza ruled Entre Rios as an independent state and for his own advantage, acquiring a very large fortune. As a leader of the federal party he made war on the Unitarians of Corrientes. In 1851 he joined forces with Brazil and Montevideo; compelled Oribe to capitulate Oct. 8, ending the "nine years' siege" of Montevideo; and on Feb. 3, 1852, defeated and overthrew Rosas at the battle of Monte Caseros. He was at once proclaimed provisional director of the Argentine Confederation, and in May, 1853, was elected president for 6 years. Buenos Ayres refused to join the confederation until forced to do so by Urquiza's victory at Cepeda, Oct. 23, 1859. Urquiza retained the presidency until May, 1860, when he took command of the army. Buenos Ayres revolted soon after, and the federal army of Urquiza was defeated by Mitre at Pavon, Sept. 17, 1861. With his defeat the federal system came to an end. Urquiza retired to Entre Rios, where he continued to rule in a kind of feudal state, though with some show of constitutional forms. He also levied taking an active part in the Paraguayan war.

Urraca (ör-rä'kä). Died 1126. Queen of Castile, daughter of Alfonso VI. of Castile. She married Alfonso of Aragon; was divorced from him in 1111; and carried on civil war in Spain against her husband and son.

Ursa Major (ėr'sä mā'jor). [L., 'the Greater Bear.'] The most prominent constellation of the northern heavens, representing a bear with an enormous tail. There is a rival figure for the same constellation — a wagon. (See Wain.) Both figures are mentioned by Homer. The name of the bears translated from some original Aryan language, since the constellation in Sanskrit is called ribsha — a word which means in different genders a "bear" and a "star." As the seven stars of the Great Bear are in many languages called the Septentrions, it is probable the figure of the bear, which by its tail can scarcely be said to resemble anything some people not familiar with bears, may have been the result of a confusion of sound. Draco appears to have had formerly a longer tail than he has now, and to have conquered the Great Bear. Draco appears to have had formerly a longer tail than he has now, and to have conquered the Great Bear. The principal stars of the Great Bear compose the figure of Charles's Wain, or the Dipper.

Ursa Minor (ėr'sä mī'nor). [L., 'the Smaller Bear.'] A constellation near the north pole, the figure of which imitates that of Ursa Major, which its configuration resembles. It also has a rival figure of a wagon, and is sometimes called the Cynosure, which seems to mean "dog's tail." At the time of the formation of these constellations the pole must have been near a Draconis; and during the greater part of history sailors have steered by Ursa Minor as a whole. In the tail of the Little Bear is the pole-star.

Ursern (ör'sern), or Urseren (ör'ser-en). The same as Andermatt.

Ursinus (ėr-sī'nus), or Urcicinus (ėr-si-sī'nus). Antipope 366–384.

Ursua (ör-sö'ä), Pedro de. Born at Ursua, near Pamplona, Navarre, about 1510: died at Machiparo, on the Upper Amazon, Jan. 1561. A Spanish soldier. He was governor of New Granada 1545–46; led expeditions from Bogotá in search of El Dorado 1547 and 1549–52, founding Pamplona and other places; and subdued the rebellious Cimarrones of Panama 1555–57. In 1559 the Marquis of Cañete, viceroy of Peru, commissioned him to lead an expedition to the region of the upper Amazon in search of Omagua and the "kingdom" of the Omaguas (which see). The ulterior object of the viceroy was to get rid of the wild adventurers who had been attracted to Peru by the civil wars. Some hundreds of these joined Ursua, who took the title of "Governor of Omagua and El Dorado," and embarked in boats at Lamas on the Mayobamba in Sept., 1560. He descended the Moyobamba and Ucayale to the Amazon, where he was killed by Lope de Aguirre and other conspirators. (See Aguirre.) Also written Orsua.

Ursula (ėr'sū-lä), Saint. [ML., 'a she-bear'; It. Orsola, Sp. Ursula, F. Ursule.] In Christian legend, a British saint and martyr who, with 11,000 virgins, was said to have been put to death by an army of Huns near Cologne. In the first part of the 12th century, in digging foundations for new walls, the citizens of Cologne found a large number of bones in the cemetery of the old Roman town Colonia Agrippina. These were announced by Elizabeth of Shonau, a visionary nun, as the relics of the 11,000 virgins, and for many years were so venerated. Bones of men and children, however, were found among them, and this was variously explained by inspired persons. The Church of St. Ursula of Cologne is still visited by thousands of credulous believers in the miraculous properties of the bones of Roman colonists. One matter-of-fact explanation of the 11,000 reduces them to one in the person of a St. "Undecemilla." St. Ursula has been identified by Dr. Oscar Schade with the Swabian goddess Horsel, or Ursel, who is the Holda (or Venus) of Teutonic mythology turned into a saint of the Christian calendar.

Urubamba (ö-rö-bäm'bä). A name given to the Ucayale in the upper part of its course.

Urugal (ö-rö-gäl'). The Babylonian Hades. The word is of Sumerian origin, and means 'the great city.'

Uruguay (ö-rö-gwī'; or, as Eng., ū'rū-gwā). A river which rises in southeastern Brazil (Santa Catharina), near the coast, flows west, southwest, and south, forms the boundary between Rio Grande do Sul in Brazil and Uruguay on the east, and the Argentine Republic on the west, and empties into the estuary of the Rio de la Plata in lat. 34° N. Its chief tributaries are the Ibicuy and Negro. Length, about 1,000 miles. It is navigable to Salto (about 200 miles), and above that, for small vessels, 300 miles further.

Uruguay, or República Oriental del Uruguay (rä-pö'blē-kä ö-rē-en-täl' del ö-rö-gwī'), often Banda Oriental (bän'dä ö-rē-en-täl'). A republic in South America, bounded by Brazil, the Atlantic, the estuary of the Rio de la Plata, and the river Uruguay (which separates it from the Argentine Republic). Capital, Montevideo. The surface consists generally of grassy plains traversed by low ridges; the chief occupation is the rearing of cattle and sheep; the leading exports, live stock, wool, beef, hides, tallow, etc. It has 19 departments. The government is vested in a president and a parliament consisting of a senate and a chamber of representatives. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. Of the inhabitants the majority are native Uruguayans, many of the country people being of the mixed castes Gauchos (which see); but there are also many Italians, Spaniards, French, Brazilians, etc. The prevailing language is Spanish. Uruguay was settled by Spanish Jesuits in the 17th century, and by Portuguese and Spanish colonists later; became a Spanish province, annexed to the viceroyalty of La Plata, in 1776; was joined to Brazil after 1817; revolted against Brazil in 1825; and was recognized as an independent state in 1828. Montevideo was besieged by the combined forces of Oribe and Rosas 1843–51. Area, 72,172 square miles. Population (1892), 728,847.

Uruguayana (ö-rö-gwī-ä'nä). A town of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, on the river Uruguay near lat. 29° 35′ S. It is the principal Brazilian port on the Uruguay, and has an important trade in cattle. The Paraguayan army which invaded Rio Grande do Sul in 1865 was besieged in this place by the combined forces of Brazil, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic, and surrendered (nearly 6,000 men) Sept. 18. The Emperor of Brazil and Presidents Mitre and Flores took part in the siege. Population, about 6,000.

Urumiah, or Oroomiah (ö-rö-mē'ä), or Urmia (ör-mē'ä). A city in the province of Azerbaijan, Persia, 70 miles west-southwest of Tabriz: the traditional birthplace of Zoroaster. It is the seat of an Armenian mission. Population, estimated, 25,000.

Urumiah, Lake. A salt lake in Persia, west of Tabriz, intersected by lat. 38° N. It contains many small islands. The water is intensely salt and is shallow. It has no outlet. Elevation above sea-level, over 4,000 feet. Length, about 85 miles.

Urundi (ö-rön'dē). A land in Africa, north of Lake Tanganyika.

Urungu (ö-röng'gö), or Ulungu (ö-löng'gö). A district in central Africa, south and southeast of Lake Tanganyika.

Urus, or Uros. See Pruquinas.

Urvashi (ör'wa-shē; Vedic ör-wa'shē). [According to Böhtlingk and Roth, from urv, wide, and then great, and vaçi = vaça, desire.] In the Rigveda, 'longing,' 'desire,' and in X. 95 personified as a woman beloved by Pururavas. The obscure hymn consists of a dialogue between Pururavas and Urvashi. They are interpreted by Max Müller ("Oxford Essays" (1856) and "Chips from a German Workshop") as the Sun and the Dawn. Urvashi is especially important as the heroine of Kalidasa's "Vikramorvashi."

Usbegs (us'begz), or Uzbegs (uz'begz). A Turkish people, socially and politically rather than ethnically distinct, dwelling in various parts of central Asia, chiefly in the cities. They form the influential class. Number, estimated, 2,000,000. They rose to power in the 13th century.

Usboi (ös-boi'). A depression in central Asia, east of the Caspian Sea and west of the Amu-Daria: formerly supposed to be the ancient course of the latter.

Usedom (ö'ze-dōm). An island, belonging to Pomerania, Prussia, which, with the island of Wollin, separates the Pomeranian Haff from the Baltic. Chief town, Swinemünde. Length, about 30 miles.

Usedom, Count Karl Georg Ludwig Guido von. Born at Hedringen, Sigmaringen, July 17, 1805; died at San Remo, Jan. 22, 1884. A Prussian diplomatist, distinguished as ambassador to Italy 1863–69.

Ushak (ö-shäk'). A town in the western part of Asia Minor, about 120 miles east of Smyrna. Population, 15,000.

Ushant (ush'ant), F. Ouessant (wes-soñ'). An island off the coast of France, belonging to the department of Finistère, in lat. 48° 28′ N., long. 5° 3′ W. It contains the village St.-Michel. Length, 4¼ miles. Population (1891), 2,490.

Ushant, Battle of. A naval battle fought near Ushant, in 1778, between the French under d'Orvilliers and the British under Keppel. The advantage was with the former.

Ushas (ö'shas; Vedic ö-shas'). [From √ vas, light up, dawn; cognate with Gr. Ἠώς, L. Aurora for Ausosa, and E. east. With the kindred Skt. usrā', dawn, is also to be compared the Old Germanic Aust-rā, a goddess of the year-dawn or spring-light, and AS. Ēastre, the name of whose festival, Easter, occurring in April, was transferred to the Christian festival which replaced it.] The Vedic Dawn, a favorite object of celebration with the poets of the Rigveda. She is the daughter of the Sky (Dyaus), sister of Bhaga, and kinswoman of Varuna, and also sister of Night and in one passage the elder sister. The Sun is her lover and follows her track. She brings the eye of the gods. Agni is also her lover, fire being kindled for sacrifice at dawn. She is the friend of the Ashvins, whom she awakens with her song. She is borne onward in a shining chariot from the distant east, and in one passage arrives in a hundred chariots. She is drawn by horses, or by cows or bulls of the same hue. She is compared to a beautiful maiden dressed by her mother, to a richly decked dancing-girl, a gally attired wife appearing before her husband, or a female enjoying splendid wealth. Both she is the life and breath of all things, causing the birds to fly from their nests, and, like an active wife arousing her household, awakening the five races of men. She is young, but is ever anew every day, and yet old — nay, immortal. See Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 181–198, for translations of Vedic hymns and details.

Usher, or Ussher (ush'ėr), James, Latinized Usserius (us-sē'ri-us). Born at Dublin, Jan. 4, 1580; died at Reigate, Surrey, England, March 20, 1656. A British prelate, theologian, and scholar. He took the degree of M. A. at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1600; was regius professor of divinity there 1607–1620; and chancellor of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, in 1603; was appointed bishop of Meath in 1620; and became archbishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland in 1624 or 1625. He was on a visit to England at the outbreak of the civil war, and took sides with Charles I., with the result that he lost nearly all his property in Ireland, with the exception of his library. He was preacher to the Society of Lincoln's Inn, London, from 1647 until shortly before his death. His most notable work is "Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti" (1650–54), in which he proposed a scheme of biblical chronology which was universally accepted until disproved by recent investigations.

Usipites (ū-sip'i-tēz), or Usipii (ū-sip'i-i), or Usipes (ū-si'pēz). [L. (Cæsar) Usipites, (Tacitus) Usipii, Gr. (Strabo) Οὐσιπέται.] A German tribe first mentioned by Cæsar, who describes them as having been driven by the Suevi (59 B. C.), together with the Tencteri, from their original homes. With the Tencteri they were defeated by Cæsar on the left bank of the Rhine, near the confluence of the Maas, whence they withdrew to the opposite side, to the north of the Sigambri. Ptolemy, who names them for the last time, places them further to the south, in the Main region. They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Usk (usk), Welsh Uttie, 'water.'] A river in South Wales and Monmouthshire, England, which joins the estuary of the Severn 18 miles westnorthwest of Bristol. Length, about 60 miles.

Uskoken (ös'kō-ken). [Serb, 'fugitives.'] Fugitives from Servia and Bosnia who went to Venetian and Hungarian lands about the beginning of the 16th century to escape Turkish tyranny.

Uskup (ös'kup), or Uskub (ös'kub), or Uskiub (ös'kē-ub), or Skoplie. The capital of the vilayet of Kossova, European Turkey, situated on the Vardar in lat. 42° 1′ N., long. 21° 32′ E.; the ancient Scupi or Scopi. It is a strategic point. It has manufactures of leather, etc. Population, about 28,000.

Uspallata (ös-päl-yä'tä) Pass. [Sp. Boquete or Portillo de Uspallata.] A pass over the Andes, between the Argentine Republic and Chile, near lat. 32° 49′ S. The highest point is about 12,300 feet above the sea (highest point on the railroad, nearly 13,000 feet). During the colonial period this pass was the principal means of communication between Santiago and the Chilean cities east of the Andes. It was the route taken by San Martin in his famous invasion of Chile, Jan., 1817. The Transandine Railroad passes through it.

Ussher, James. See Usher.

Uta (ū'tä), or Utah, or Ute (ūt'ē), or Youta. [Pl., also Utas or Utahs.] A division of the Shoshonean stock of North American Indians, embracing 15 tribes, which formerly occupied the entire central and western portions of Colorado and the northeastern portion of Utah, including the eastern part of Salt Lake valley and Utah valley. On the south they extended into New Mexico, occupying much of the country drained by the Rio San Juan. In the northeastern part of their range they intermarried extensively with other Shoshonean branches, as the Shoshoni, Bannock, and ute the Uintah Shoshone. The Uta are now confined to reservations, and they number in Southern Ute agency, Colorado, 985; in Ouray reserve, Utah, 1,071; and in Uintah reserve, Utah, 833. Total, 2,889. See Shoshonean.

Utah. See Uta.

Utah (ū'tä or ū'tä). [From the Indian tribal name.] One of the United States, Capital, Salt Lake City. It is bounded by Idaho and Wyoming on the north, Wyoming and Colorado on the east, Arizona on the south, and Nevada on the west. The surface is mountainous and plateau, including the Wahsatch and Uintah Mountains and part of the Great Basin. The Great Salt Lake is in the north. The silver- and the lead-mines are important. Utah contains 26 counties, and sends 2 senators and 1 representative to Congress. The inhabitants are largely Mormons. This region formed part of the lands ceded by Mexico in 1848. The Mormons settled here in 1847–48. Utah was organized as a Territory in 1850. The Mountain Meadow massacre of Gentile settlers by Indians and Mormons occurred in 1857. Disturbances in 1870 led to the sending of an expedition of United States troops to Utah in 1877; the Mormons submitted in 1858. The Edmunds Act of 1882, followed by supplementary legislation, punished and discouraged polygamy in the Mormon church. A large Gentile immigration has taken place in recent years. On July 17, 1894, the President signed a bill admitting Utah to the Union as a State — the forty-fifth. Area, 84,970 square miles. Population (1890), 207,905.

Utah Lake. A fresh-water lake in Utah, 28 miles south of Salt Lake City. Its outlet is by the Jordan into Great Salt Lake. Height above sea-level, about 4,400 feet. Length, 23 miles.

Utatlan (ö-tät-län'), or Gumarcaah (gö-märkä-ä'). The ancient capital of the Quiché Indians of Guatemala, near the site of the modern city of Santa Cruz del Quiché. It is said to have vied with Mexico in splendor, and was fortified with great skill. It was overthrown by Alvarado or "kings" reigned in it. (see Quiché.) It was destroyed by Alvarado in 1524.

Utliberg (üt'lē-berg). A peak of Mount Albis, Switzerland, 4 miles west of Zurich: noted for its view. Height, 2,864 feet.

Utopia (ū-tō'pi-ä). [NL., 'no where,' from Gr. οὐ, no, not, and τόπος, place, spot.] A political romance by Sir Thomas More, published in Latin in 1516: so called from an imaginary island, the seat of an ideal commonwealth. The original title was "De Optimo Reipublicæ statu, deque Nova Insula Utopia." It was translated in 1551 by Ralph Robinson, and by Bishop Burnet in 1685. The name "Utopia" has given rise to the adjective utopian with the meaning of "impracticable or ideal, especially as applied to schemes for the advancement of social conditions.

Utrecht (ū'trekt; D. pron. ü'trecht). 1. A province of the Netherlands, bounded by North Holland, Zuyder Zee, Gelderland, and South Holland. Area, 553 square miles. Population (1892), 229,054. — 2. The capital of the province of Utrecht, situated on the Kromme Rijn, at its division into the Vecht and the Oude Rijn, in lat. 52° 5′ N., long. 5° 7′ E.: the Roman Trajectus (Ferry). It is a railway center, and has manufactures of cigars, chemicals, etc. The noted Cathedral of St. Martin consists of a spacious choir and transepts of the 13th century. The nave fell in 1674, and was not rebuilt: thus the fine west tower, 338 feet high, stands at a distance from the existing church. The existing is 115 feet high, and the proportions and details are excellent. It rests but on the seat of a university. Its mediæval bishops possessed great power. It was often a residence of the German emperors, and was an early seat of the States-General. Population (1892), 98,436.

Utrecht, Peace of. The peace concluded in 1713, through several separate treaties, between France on one side and Great Britain, the Netherlands, Prussia, Savoy, and Portugal on the other. With the subsequent treaties of Rastatt and Baden it put an end to the War of the Spanish Succession. Philip V. of France was confirmed as king of Spain; the crowns never to be united; and France recognized the Protestant succession in England. Prussia was recognized as a kingdom, and Savoy was made a kingdom. Great Britain received Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, in North America, and Gibraltar and Minorca with the right to send African slaves to America. Holland was secured by the Barrier Treaty; the Spanish Netherlands to be transferred to the Empire; with Sardinia, the Milanese, and Naples. Savoy received Sicily. Prussia received Neufchâtel and part of Gelderland, and renounced its claims to Orange. Portugal was confirmed in Brazil and America.

Utrecht, Union of. The union, concluded in 1579, of the seven united provinces, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Gelderland, Overyssel, Groningen, and Friesland, which formed the nucleus of the Netherlands.

Uxbridge (uks'brij). A town in Middlesex, England, situated on the Colne 18 miles west by north of London. It was the scene of unsuccessful negotiations between Parliamentary and Royalist commissioners at the beginning of 1645. Population (1891), 8,206.

Uxmal (ūz-mäl'). A ruined city of Yucatan, Mexico, about 70 miles south of Merida. The remains are scattered over several square miles, but only a few of the buildings have the walls still standing. These are generally raised on artificial substructures (truncated pyramids), and are of Cyclopean masonry faced with dressed stone, in many cases elaborately sculptured. Some of them are very large. One called "Casa del Gobernador" is 320 feet long, but narrow. The so-called "Casa de las Monjas" is built around a courtyard which measures 288 by 214 feet. There are no ideas as at Copan, and nothing resembling the stucco-work of Palenque. One of the most curious features is the great number of Potbarrent ornaments called "elephants' trunks" by Waldeck. The origin of Uxmal is unknown, but there can be little doubt that it was built by a Maya people. Stephens believed that some of the temples were used by the Indians as late as 1673.

Uz (uz). In biblical geography, a land east of Palestine: the home of Job. It is sometimes placed in Hauran.

Uzziah (u-zī'ä). A name of Azariah, king of Judah, son of Amaziah. He reigned 792–740 B.C. (811–758 ?).

Amaziah was succeeded by Uzziah whose long and prosperous reign appears to have corresponded pretty exactly with that of Jeroboam II. The current chronology, which obscures this correspondence, is certainly corrupt; and we shall not be far wrong if we view Uzziah and Jotham as the contemporaries of Jeroboam II. and Menahem, while Ahaz of Judah came to the throne soon after Menahem's death, and saw the greater part of the wars which began with the invasion of Tiglath-Pileser and closed with the fall of Samaria. W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 194.

Vaal (väl). The chief head stream and tributary of the Orange River, South Africa. It runs in the chief part of the boundary between the Transvaal Republic and the Orange Free State, and joins the Orange River about lat. 29° 10′ S., long. 24° 15 E. Length, 500–600 miles.

Vaca de Castro (vä'kä dā käs'trō), Cristóval. Born in 1492; died in 1562. A Spanish lawyer and administrator. He was a member of the audience of Valladolid, and in 1540 was sent to Peru to inquire into certain alleged abuses, with orders to act as governor in case of Pizarro's death. He landed on the coast of New Granada (spring of 1541), and crossed to Popayan, where he heard of the assassination of Pizarro and the rebellion of the younger Almagro. Aided by loyal Spaniards, he advanced into Peru. Almagro was defeated at Chupas (Sept. 16, 1542), and executed, and Castro held the government until the arrival of Viceroy Vela, May 15, 1544. The latter imprisoned him on suspicion of conspiring with the rebels against the new laws, but he escaped and reached Spain in 1545. There he was arrested on charges of peculation, etc., but was exonerated in 1556, after 11 years' imprisonment.

Valais (vā-lā'), G. Wallis (väl'lis). [From L. valles, a valley.] A canton of Switzerland. Capital, Sion. It is bounded by the Lake of Geneva, Vaud, and Bern on the north (separated from Bern by the Bernese Alps), Uri, Ticino, and Italy on the east, Italy on the south (separated by the main chain of the Alps), and France on the west. It comprises the upper valley of the Rhone and the surrounding mountains. It has 5 representatives in the National Council. The inhabitants are about two thirds French and about one third German. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. Valais was incorporated in the Roman Empire in the time of Augustus. In the middle ages it was a part of Burgundy, and later was divided among various rulers (Savoy, bishop of Sion, etc.). Upper Valais formed a league with the Swiss cantons in 1416, and about 1475 reduced most of Lower Valais. Valais was made a canton of the Helvetic Republic in 1798: became a separate republic in 1802; was incorporated with France in 1810; and was made a canton in 1815. It was disturbed by civil dissensions, and joined the Sonderbund in 1845. Area, 2,027 square miles. Population (1888), 101,985.

Valdivia (väl-dē'vē-ä). 1. A province in Chile, intersected by lat. 40° S. Area, 8,315 square miles. Population (1892), 62,020.—2. A town, capital of the province of Valdivia, Chile, on the Calla-calla River near the sea: its port, called the Corral, is at the mouth of the river. It was founded as a fort by Pedro de Valdivia in Feb., 1552; was a point of great importance during the wars with the Araucanians; and was destroyed by them in the great uprising of 1599. Rebuilt in 1644, it was strongly fortified; pronounced for independence in 1810, but fell into the hands of the Spaniards; and was finally taken by the patriots under Cochrane, after a three days' fight from fort to fort, Feb. 2–4, 1820. Population, about 8,000.

Valdivia, Luis de. Born in Granada, 1561: died at Valladolid, Nov. 5, 1642. A Spanish Jesuit, missionary in Chile from about 1590 to 1621. He published several works on the Araucanian and other Indian languages, and histories of the Indian wars.

Valdivia, Pedro de. Born near La Serena, Estremadura, 1498 or 1500: died near the fort of Tucapel, southern Chile, Jan. 1 (?), 1554. A Spanish soldier, conqueror of Chile. He served in the Italian wars; went to Venezuela about 1534; and in 1535 passed to Peru, where he served with Pizarro's forces at the battle of Las Salinas, April 26, 1538. After Almagro's death, Pedro Sanchez de Hoz, an incompetent man, was sent from Spain to complete the conquest of Chile; Pizarro associated Valdivia with him, and Hoz soon became a cipher in the expedition. Leaving Cuzco in March, 1540, with 150 Spanish soldiers and a large body of Indians, Valdivia marched by the coast deserts, defeated a large body of natives in the valley of Chile, and on Feb. 12, 1541, founded Santiago. The Indians soon rose against him, and he was closely besieged until the arrival of reinforcements from Peru in Dec., 1543. Valparaiso was founded in Sept., 1544, and in 1546 Valdivia pushed into the Araucanian country to the river Biobio. In 1547–49 he was in Peru, serving with Gasca to suppress the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro: during his absence the country was ruled by Villagra. In 1550–51 the Spaniards continued their conquest of the Araucanian country, passing the Biobio and founding Concepcion, Imperial, Valdivia, etc. Late in 1553 there was a great uprising of the Indians. Valdivia, with fifty horsemen, started from Concepcion to relieve Tucapel, which was closely besieged; was attacked and defeated by the Indians; and was captured and put to death shortly after. Authorities do not agree as to the precise date of the battle and of Valdivia's death.

Valentin (val'en-tin), Gabriel Gustav. Born at Breslau, Prussia, July 8, 1810; died at Bern, May 24, 1883. A German physiologist, professor at Bern from 1836. Among his works are "Lehrbuch der Physiologie des Menschen" (1845), "Grundriss der Physiologie des Menschen" (1846), etc.

Valentine (val'en-tin), Saint. A Christian martyr of the reign of the emperor Claudius (about 270). His festival was observed on the 14th of Feb. before the time of Gregory the Great. The custom of sending valentines had its origin in a heathen practice connected with the worship of Juno on or about this day: its association with the saint is wholly accidental.

Valentine. 1. One of the "two gentlemen of Verona" in Shakspere's play of that name.—2. A gentleman attending on the duke in Shakspere's "Twelfth Night."—3. The principal character in Congreve's "Love for Love." Betterton was famous in this part, with Mrs. Bracegirdle as Angelica.—4. A light-hearted spendthrift in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Wit without Money."—5. The brother of Gretchen in Goethe's "Faust." He is killed by Faust in a street affray.

Valentine. A novel by George Sand, published in 1832; so called from the name of the heroine. The scene is laid in Berry.

Valentine and Orson (ôr'son). A romance of the Charlemagne cycle, which was written during the reign of Charles VIII., and first printed in 1495 at Lyons. Several plays, etc., have been founded on it. Bathawny and Munday produced one in 1593. Mrs. Inchbald's romance was published in 1806. Valentine and Orson were twins, born in a forest. Orson was carried off by a bear, and became rough and uncouth. Valentine was cared for by his uncle, King Pepin, and grew up a courtier. Hence the allusions in literature.

Valentinian I. (val-en-tin'i-an). L. Flavius Valentinianus (val-en-tin-i-ā'nus). Born at Cibalæ, Pannonia, about 321; died at Bregetio (near Conserio), Nov. 17, 375. A Roman officer, proclaimed emperor by the army in 364. He associated with himself his younger brother Valens as emperor of the East, and retained the West. He was actively engaged in strengthening the northern frontiers against the barbarians.

Valentinian II. Born about 371: murdered in 392. Son of Valentinian I., made associate emperor of the West with his half-brother Gratian in 375. He was delivered from the rivalry of the usurper Maximus by Theodosius 387–388, and was assassinated by his general Arbogast.

Valentinian III., L. Flavius Placidus Valentinianus. Born 419: assassinated 455. Son of Constantius and Placidia, made emperor of the West in 425. His famous general Aetius gained the victory of Châlons over Attila in 451. Himself was murdered by Valentinian, from jealousy, in 454. Among the losses of his reign were Africa (to the Vandals), Britain, and large parts of Gaul and Spain.

Valentinian, The. A poem by Fletcher, produced before 1618, printed in 1647. It contains some beautiful songs.

Valentinois (vä-lon-tē-nwä'). A former small county of France, in Dauphiné, in the vicinity of Valence.

Valentinois, Duchess of. A title of Diana of Poitiers.

Valentinus (val-en-tī'nus). Born probably in Egypt: died about 160 A. D. One of the chief Gnostic teachers. He was educated probably in Alexandria: went to Rome about 138; and was an instructor of Origen and Clement. Fragments of his works have survived.

Valentinus appears to have been considered the most formidable and dangerous of this school of Gnostics. He was twice excommunicated, and twice received again into the bosom of the Church. He did not confine his dangerous opinions to the school of Alexandria: he introduced the wild Oriental speculations into the more peaceful West: taught at Rome; and, a third time being expelled from the Christian society, retired to Cyprus—an island where the Jews were formerly numerous till the fatal insurrection in the time of Hadrian, and where probably the original pagan population did not find an unwelcome reception, on the border as it were, of European and Asiatic. Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 72.

Valentinus. Pope in 827.

Valerius Maximus (mak'si-mus). Lived in the first part of the 1st century A. D. A Roman rhetorician and historian. Of his life nothing is known except that he accompanied Sextus Pompeius to Asia in 27 A. D.

Valerius Maximus dedicated to Tiberius a collection of anecdotes for rhetorical purposes, factorum et dictorum memorabilium libri novem, which he had taken from few sources, in an uncritical manner and without taste or discrimination. This shallow writer perpetually obtrudes his flattery of Tiberius and his personal observations. The diction is declamatory, the style overloaded, but the vocabulary is still tolerably pure.

He held various offices, and rose to the pretorship; joined the party of Pompey; was made by Cæsar chief of the public libraries; and was employed by the second Triumvirate, but was saved by his friends. The total number of his works is about 74, comprising 620 books. Of these only two, "De lingua latina" and "De re rustica," have come down to former only in part).

Varro's prose writings embraced almost all branches of knowledge and literature, oratory, history both general and literary, jurisprudence, grammar, philosophy, geography, history, etc. But in all this universal study Varro always kept his own country and its past steadily in view, and through that portion of his writings extended an important influence, both directly and indirectly. The Christian Fathers especially, and among them preeminently S. Augustine, studied and used him diligently. The most important prose works of Varro were his "Antiquitates rerum humanarum et divinarum," which long survived in literature, the books "De lingua latina," "Rerum rusticarum," the Encyclopedia of the artes liberales ("Disciplinarum libri"), and his "Imagines."

Varuna (vä'rö-nä). [From √vr or var, cover, encompass; cognate with Greek οὐρανός, heaven, and E. heaven.] 'The Encompasser' of the universe: in the Rigveda, the name of an Aditya, the supreme god among those of the Veda, and therefore called king. To him belong especially the waters, the night, and the West. He is the judge who punishes sin and who is appealed to for forgiveness. From him come avenging diseases, especially dropsy. He is often associated with Mitra, he being the ruler of the night, as Mitra of the day. He is the noblest character of the Vedic pantheon, the few Varuna hymns having a loftier ethical character than is found in any others. Roth identifies the Adityas with the Amshaspands of the Avesta, and Varuna with Ahura Mazda or Ormazd, regarding Varuna as belonging to an older dynasty of gods common to the Indo-Aryans, of whom he believes the Rigveda to show the supersession of Varuna by Indra. (On this question, see Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," V. 116–125.) In the later literature Varuna becomes a mere god of the waters.

Varus (vā'rus). The ancient name of the Var.

Olmsted, designed the plans of Central Park, New York city; the State reservation at Niagara Falls; and numerous other parks. His design for Prospect Park, Brooklyn, was accepted in 1866.

Vauxhall (väks-hâl'). A quarter of London, in Lambeth.

Vauxhall Gardens. A popular and fashionable London resort, formerly situated on the Thames above Lambeth.

The name dates from the marriage of Isabella de Fortibus, Countess of Albemarle, sister of Archbishop Baldwin, with Foukes de Brent, after which the place was called Foukes-hall, . . . Vauxhall Gardens were laid out in 1661, and were at first known as the New Spring Gardens at Foxhall to distinguish them from the Old Spring Gardens at Whitehall. They were finally closed in 1859, and the site is now built over. . . . Here they will always be remembered from Sir Roger de Coverley's visit to them in the "Spectator" (and the descriptions in "Humphrey Clinker" and "Vanity Fair").

Vava (vä'vou). One of the principal islands of the Friendly group, Pacific Ocean: 42 miles in circumference.

Vavitau. See Vavitao.

Vecelli, or Vecellio. See Titian.

Vecht (vecht). An arm of the Rhine which leaves it at Utrecht and flows into the Zuyder Zee east of Amsterdam.

Vecta (vek'tä), or Vecta (vek'tä). The Roman name of the Isle of Wight.

Veda (vā'dä). [Skt., from √vid, know.] 'Knowledge,' 'science,' and then the whole Hindu sacred literature as the science. This includes the Sanhitas, 'collections' of mantras, 'hymns': the Brahmanas, canonized 'priestly dicta,' with their developments, the Aranyakas and the Upanishads; and the Sutras, 'rules,' brief memorial lines to aid the teacher in the oral tradition of the sacred literature—the Sanhitas and Brahmanas together forming Shruti, 'hearing,' 'revelation,' while the Sutras constitute Smriti, 'memory,' 'tradition.' There are four Sanhitas, the Vedas, in distinction from the Veda as including the whole body of sacred literature, or as applied to the Rigveda par excellence, viz. the Rigveda, the Samaveda, the Yajurveda, and the Atharveda. Of these the Rigveda and the Atharveda are historical collections—that is, collections formed with a view to the perpetuation of the ancient sacred literature; while the Samaveda and the Yajurveda are liturgical—material already existing in the Rigveda and elsewhere being in them put to special liturgical uses. Hymns in an equally ancient, and importance is the Rigveda, containing 1,017 suktas ('hymns'), in 10,580 rcas, 'verses.' (The sound ch, in whatever pronounced as ch in church, when it stands alone becomes ri, but when it comes before a letter or syllable of the Veda, usually printed Rigveda, means 'the Veda of rcas (pronounced richas), "verses," songs.') The hymns, in a very simple metrical form, and a language scarcely distinguishable from the later classical Sanskrit, at almost all religions, and glorifications of the divinity addressed. The Atharveda (which see) is the latest of the four collections. The Samaveda is the Veda of samans, 'chants.' Material almost all of which is found in the Rigveda here appears in the form of chants to be sung in the Soma ritual. Certain words to be uttered at a special stage of a sacrifice were known technically as a yajus, 'sacrificial formula.' The Yajurveda (with these yajus changed into rcas owing to the effect of the following letter) is the Yajurveda, or Veda of sacrificial formulas." The question of the date of the Rigveda, as the oldest of the collections of hymns, has been much debated, but with little definite results. The majority of Vedic scholars place the Vedic period proper between 2000 and 1500 B. C.

Vedanta (vā-dān'ta). [Veda and anta, end.] The most common designation of the Uttaramimansa (see that word), a school of Hindu philosophy, given to it either as teaching the ultimate aim of the Veda, or as founded on the Upanishads, which come at the end of the Veda as the last stage in its historic evolution. It is ascribed to a Vyasa or Badarayana. The first of these names Catharine's Jews identify with the legendary person who is supposed to have arranged the Veda, and to have written the Mahabharata, Puranas, and a Dharma-shastra, and was doubtless applied to various great writers or compilers as a kind of title. In the second name the reference is given to the founder of the Vedanta. Its principles are propounded in sutras, but Badarayana's sutras are generally called Brahmasutras, or Sariraka-mimansa sutras. The text and that of the celebrated commentary of Shankaracarya have been edited in the "Bibliotheca Indica," and a portion translated by Roer. Ballantyne has edited and translated a portion, as also the commentary known as the Vedantasara. The most authoritative recent works on the Vedanta are, however, Paul Deussen's "Die Sutra des Vedanta übersetzt und Shankara's System dargestellt" and his "Das System des Vedanta" (Leipsic, 1883).

Vedantasara (vā-dān-ta-sā'ra). [Skt., 'essence of the Vedanta.'] A treatise on the Vedanta philosophy by Sadananda. The text is printed in Bohtlingk's "Sanskrit Chrestomathie," and is here translated with full notes in Trübner's "Oriental series" by Jacob. The name is also given to a commentary by Ramanuja on the Vedantasutras, which is also called Vedantaparidipa, "The Light or Lamp of the Vedanta."

Vedas. See Veda.

Veddahs (ved'äz), or Weddahs. An ancient and probably aboriginal people of Ceylon, in a very low state of civilization.

Vedder (ved'ėr), Elihu. Born at New York, Feb. 26, 1836. An American genre and figure-painter. He studied in Paris and Italy, where he has lived for a number of years. He illustrated a translation of the "Rubaiyat," by Omar Khayyam, 1883–84. Among his other works are "The Lair of the Sea-serpent," "The Bee's Egg," "The Lost Mind," "The Crucifixion," "The Cumæan Sibyl," "Young Marsyas," "The Monk upon the Gloomy Path," "The Questioner of the Sphinx," etc.

Vega (vā'gä), [From Ar. waqi', falling, i. e. 'the falling bird,' with reference to Aquila, the 'flying eagle,' situated not far from Vega.] A star of the first magnitude in the constellation Lyra; a Lyræ.

Vega. The vessel in which Nordenskjöld made his expedition of 1878–79.

Vega (vā'gä), Garcilasso de la, Born at Cuzco, Peru, April 12, 1539: died at Cordova, Spain, 1616. A Peruvian historian, known also as a distinguished Spanish officer of the same name, and his mother was a niece of the Inca Huaina Capac (whence he called himself Garcilasso Inca de la Vega). He went to Spain in 1560; served for many years as a captain in the Spanish army; and finally settled in Cordova, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He published "El Florida del Inca," a description of Soto's expedition to Florida (1605), "Comentarios reales de las Incas" (1608), and "Historia general del Peru" (1616). There are many later editions and translations.

Vega Carpio (vā'gä kär'pē-ō), Lope Felix de. Born at Madrid, Nov. 25, 1562: died there, Aug. 27, 1635. A celebrated Spanish dramatist and poet. He was educated at the Jesuit college of Madrid and at the University of Alcalá, was in the service of the Bishop of Avila, and settled in Madrid in 1587. He was twice married. He was obliged to live away from Madrid for several years on account of a duel. He joined the Spanish Armada in 1588, and returned to Madrid in 1590, and was soon known as a dramatic writer; he had previously, during his exile written for the theater in Valencia. He was the inventor of a witty character known as the "gracioso," a parody of the heroic character of the play, which passed first to the French and from that to all other modern theaters. He entered the church about 1612, after the death of his second wife, and about 1614 took priest's orders. His plays fall into three classes: the first, called "Comedias de Capa y Espada" (dramas with cloak and sword) "took their name from the circumstance that their principal personages belonging to the genteel part of society, accustomed, in Lope's time, to the picturesque mixture of Spanish and Moorish words—excluding, on the one hand, those dramas in which royal personages appear, and, on the other, those which are devoted to common life and the humbler classes. Their main and nearest principle is certainly such gallantry as existed in the time of the author. The story is almost always involved and intriguing, and almost always accompanied with an underplot and parody on the characters and adventures of the principal parties, formed out of those of the servants and other inferior personages" (Tickner). The second class consisted of "Comedias Heroicas" or "Historiales" and the third of dramas founded on domestic life. He also wrote epics ("La Jerusalen conquistada"), romances, lyrics, pastorals, prose novels, etc.

Their [Lope's plays'] very number, however, may have been one obstacle to their publication; for the most moderate and certain accounts on this point have almost a fabulous air about them so extravagant do they seem. In 1603, he says, his first dozen of hundred-and-nineteen pieces that he had already written; in 1609, he says their number had risen to four hundred and eighty three; in 1618 he says it was eight hundred; in 1620, again, in round numbers, that it was a little above a hundred; and in 1624, at one thousand and seventy. After his death, in 1635, Perez de Montalvan, his intimate friend and eulogist, who three years before had declared the number to be fifteen hundred, without reckoning the shorter pieces, puts it at eighteen hundred plays and four hundred autos, numbers which are confidently repeated by Antonio in his notice of Lope, and by Franchi, an Italian, who had been much with Lope at Madrid, and who wrote one of the multitudinous eulogies on him after his death. The prodigious facility implied by this is further confirmed by the fact, stated by himself in one of his plays, that it was written and acted in five days, and by the anecdotes of Montalvan that he wrote five full-length dramas at Toledo in fifteen days, and one act of another in a few hours of the early morning, without seeming to make any effort in either case.

Tickner, Span. Lit., II. 203.

Vega Real (rä-äl'), Battle of the. A battle fought on the Vega Real (a plain in the northern part of Haiti) in April 25, 1495, between a small force of Spaniards under Christopher and Bartholomew Columbus and the Indians of Caonabo and other chiefs. Las Casas says that the latter numbered 100,000—an evident exaggeration. The Indians were completely defeated.

Veglia (vāl'yä), Slav. Krk. 1. An island belonging to Istria, Austria-Hungary, situated in the Gulf of Quarnero in lat. 45° N. It is separated from the mainland by the channel of Morlacca. Length, 24 miles. Population, 19,871. —2. A small seaport on the island of Veglia. It has a cathedral.

Vehmgerichte (fām'ge-riĕ'te). [G., from fehm, a criminal tribunal so named, and gericht, judgment.] Mediæval tribunals which flourished in Germany, chiefly in Westphalia, in the 14th and 15th centuries. They were apparently descended from the cantonal courts, and at first afforded some protection, as the regular machinery of justice had become demoralized. Later they usurped their power, and practically disappeared with the increasing strength of the regular governments. The president of the court was called freygraf, the justice freischöffe, and the place of meeting freistuhl. The sessions were open for the adjudication of civil matters, but secret when persons accused of murder, robbery, heresy, witchcraft, etc., were summoned. Those convicted of serious crimes, or those who refused to appear before the tribunal, were put to death. Also freigerichte, Westphalian gerichte, etc.

Vehse (fā'ze), Karl Eduard. Born at Freiberg, Saxony, Dec. 1, 1802; died at Striesen, near Dresden, June 18, 1870. A German historian. He came to America with the separatist Stephen in 1838, but returned in 1839; went to Berlin in 1855, but was arrested for political expressions, imprisoned for six months, and banished from Prussia; and lived thereafter near Basel and in Italy and at Freiberg. His chief work is "Geschichte der deutschen Höfe seit der Reformation" ("History of the German Courts since the Reformation," 1851–58).

Vei, or Vai (vi). A negro tribe of Liberia, West Africa, north of Monrovia. It belongs to the Mandechieze, and has made its way from the elevated interior to the coast. About 1834 a Vei-man, Doalu Bukere, who had learned the Roman character, invented and introduced a new graphic system, of the syllabic type, with upward of two hundred signs, which has been used by the Mohammedans for their manuscript books.

Veii (vē'yi). In ancient geography, a city of Italy, the most important of the Etruscan League: identified with Isola Farnese, 11 miles north by west of Rome. It was frequently at war with Rome, especially in behalf of the restoration of Tarquinius superbus, at the time of the massacre of the Fabii (about 476 B. C.), about 438–434, and about 426. It was besieged by the Romans and taken under the leadership of Camillus in 396 B. C.

Veile (vī'le). 1. An amt in Jutland, Denmark. Population, 111,904.—2. The capital of the amt of Veile, Denmark, situated on the Veile Fjord in lat. 55° 44' N. It was taken by the Schleswig-Holsteiners May 5, 1848. Near it, at Gudsø, May 7, 1849, the Prussians defeated the Danes. Veile was stormed by the Austrians March 8, 1864. Population, 9,015.

Veintemilla (vā-ēn-tā-mēl'yä), Ignacio. Born in Cuenca, 1830. An Ecuadorian general and politician. He led the liberal revolt which overthrew President Borrero in Dec., 1876; was proclaimed president with extraordinary powers; and in 1882 became practically dictator with the title of supreme chief. He was deposed and driven from the country, after several months of civil war, July, 1883.

Veit (fīt), Philipp. Born at Berlin, Feb. 13, 1793; died at Mainz, Dec. 18, 1877. A noted German painter, a grandson of Moses Mendelssohn. He was associated with Cornelius, Overbeck, and Schadow. Among his works are "Seven Years of Plenty" (Rome), "Christianity bringing Civilization to Germany" (Frankfort), "Assumption of Mary" (Frankfort cathedral), "Egyptian Darkness," etc.

Vela, Blasco Nuñez. See Nuñez Vela.

Velabrum (ve-lā'brum). An area in ancient Rome, between the Capitoline, the Palatine, and the Tiber, extending northeastward to the Forum Romanum. It was a marsh before the construction of the Cloaca Maxima. The marble arch built in honor of Severus by the merchants of the Velabrum formed a portal between it and the Forum Boarium on the south.

Velasco, José Antonio Manso de. See Manso de Velasco.

Velasco (vā-läs'kō), José Miguel de. Born at Santa Cruz de la Sierra about 1795: died there, 1859. A Bolivian general and politician. As vice-president he was twice acting president during the disorders of 1828–29; a revolt in the South in 1838 was elected president after the fall of Santa Cruz in 1839, but was deposed in 1841; and was again president 1847–48 during a period of great disorder which culminated in his deposition.

Velasco, Juan de. Born at Riobamba (now in Ecuador) about 1737: died at Verona, Italy, 1819. A Jesuit historian. He was for many years a professor in the University of San Marcos at Lima. After the expulsion of his order in 1767, he lived at Faenza and Verona. His principal work is "Historia del reino de Quito" (first published in French 1840; Spanish edition, Quito, 1841–44). It includes an account of the Scyri kingdom of Quito.

Velasco, Luis de, Count of Santiago. Born at Toledo about 1500: died at Mexico City, July 31, 1564. A Spanish administrator, second viceroy of Mexico from Dec., 1550, until his death. He revised the "New Laws," emancipating, it is said, 150,000 Indians; put down revolts of the Chichimecs; and fitted out Legazpe's expedition to the Philippine Islands.

Velasco, Luis de, Count of Santiago and Marquis of Salinas (from 1585). Born at Madrid, 1539: died at Seville, 1617 (?). A Spanish administrator, son of the preceding. He was viceroy of Mexico Feb. 5, 1590–Nov., 1595; viceroy of Peru July 24, 1596–Nov. 28, 1604; and again viceroy of Mexico July 19, 1607–July 31, 1611. Subsequently he was president of the Council of the Indies. He was one of the best of the Spanish colonial rulers.

Velasquez (vā-läs'käth), Diego. Born at Cuéllar, Segovia, 1465 (or 1458?): died at Havana, Cuba, 1522 or 1523. A Spanish soldier and administrator. He went to Española with Columbus in 1493, and was prominent in the affairs of that island until 1511, when he was sent by Diego Columbus to conquer Cuba. He had numerous conflicts with the Indians, who defended, Hatuey, was captured and burned in Feb., 1512; founded Santiago, Havana, and other towns; and continued to rule the island, which was only nominally subject to the authority of Nicolas de Ovando. He furnished a vessel for the expedition of Cordova, which discovered Yucatan in 1517; fitted out Grijalva's expedition in 1518 (see Grijalva); and in 1519 sent Hernando Cortés against Montezuma, whom, as he had left the island, refused obedience to Velasquez, who, in March, 1520, sent Pánfilo de Narvaez to arrest him. Narvaez joined Cortés, and subsequent efforts of Velasquez to secure the rich conquests of Mexico for himself ended in failure. His death, it is said, was caused by grief at this failure.

Velasquez (vā-läs'käth), or Velazquez (vā-läth'käth), Diego Rodriguez de Silva. Born at Seville (baptized June 6, 1599): died at Madrid, Aug. 7, 1660. A celebrated Spanish painter. He was the son of Juan Rodriguez de Silva, but took his mother's name Velasquez. He was a pupil of Herrera el Viejo and of Pacheco whose daughter he married. He was patronized by Philip IV.; became court painter about 1623; visited Italy 1629–31; and for eighteen years painted portraits, landscapes, and historical and genre subjects in Madrid. From 1652 to 1660 he was quartermaster-general of the king's household, and died from over-fatigue in the preparations for the marriage of Louis XIV. and the infanta Maria Theresa. Among his principal works in his earlier manner are "The Water-Carrier of Seville" (Apsley House) and "The Adoration of the Shepherds" (National Gallery, London). Among his other works are "Los Borrachos," "Las Meninas," "Las Hilanderas," "The Expulsion of the Moriscos," "Forge of Vulcan" (Madrid Museum); "Joseph's Coat" (Escorial); "St. John the Evangelist" (London); "Boar Hunt," "Lot and his Daughters," "The Surrender of Breda," and a Crucifixion (in the Prado); etc. His famous portraits are those of Philip IV., of which he painted about forty; Innocent X., Quevedo (Apsley House); Admiral Pulido Pareja (National Gallery, London); Olivares, Prince Baltasar Carlos, a series of portraits of jesters and dwarfs; etc. His genius was not fully known till about the beginning of the 19th century, when the royal pictures were collected in the Museo del Prado. About 275 pictures are attributed to him, of which 121 are in Great Britain, 7 in the United States, and others in different European galleries.

Veldeke (vel'de-ke). Heinrich von. Born in the neighborhood of Maestricht, Holland: flourished at the end of the 12th century. A Middle High German poet, the founder of the German court epic poetry. He was of noble family and in the service of the Counts of Looz and Rineck, burgraves of Mayence. At the court of Cleves he began to write, between 1175 and 1184, his poem "Eneit" ("Eneid") after a French original. The manuscript was stolen from a Countess of Cleves, to whom it had been loaned, by a Count of Schwarzenberg, who took it to Thuringia. In 1184, in Thuringia, Veldeke finally got back his work, and completed it at the court of Count Palatine of Saxony, afterward the landgrave Hermann of Thuringia. An earlierwork, supposed by some to be by him, is written by another poet of the same name, is the "Legende van S. Servaes." He was, besides, the author of a number of lyrics. The "Eneid" was published by Bodmer in 1882.

Venezuela (ven-e-zwē'lā): Sp., in full. Estados Unidos de Venezuela (ās-tā'dōs ō-nē'dōs dā vā-nith-wā'lā). [For origin of name, see Venice.] A federal republic in the northern part of South America, bounded by the Caribbean Sea, British Guiana, Brazil, and Colombia. Capital, Caracas. Branches of the Colombian Andes traverse the northwestern portion, and are continuous with a range along the northern coast called the Maritime Andes or Venezuelan Coast Range: south of these are the plains bordering the Orinoco and its tributaries, and including the vast stretches of grass-land called the llanos (which see); southeast of the Orinoco (Venezuelan Guiana) there are broken or mountainous lands. The southern and eastern boundaries are unsettled. The chief industries are agriculture, coffee, cacao, tobacco, etc., in the mountain regions, and grazing on the llanos; gold, copper, etc., are mined in considerable quantities. The limits and names of the states and territories have been frequently changed. In 1893 there were 9 states, 5 territories, and a federal district. The executive is vested in a president chosen for two years, and responsible ministers. Congress consists of a senate and chamber of deputies. The prevailing language is Spanish, and the prevailing religion Roman Catholic: religious liberty is guaranteed by the constitution. Venezuela was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was conquered and settled principally by agents of the commercial house of the Welsers, who held a grant of the country from Charles V. during part of the 16th century. Later the greater part of it was included in the Spanish captain-generalcy of Caracas. A numerous revolts broke out in 1810, and were suppressed 1812–13 and 1815–16; and were finally successful in 1821. Until 1830 the country was included in the Colombian republic of Bolivar. The irreconcilable principles of the federalist and centralist parties have led to many civil wars and several changes of the constitution. Area (claimed), 426,700 square miles; actually held, probably less than 400,000 square miles. Population (census of 1891), 2,323,527.

Venice (ven'is). A province of the kingdom of Italy, Area, 934 square miles. Population (1892), 379,254.

Venice (ven'is). [F. Venise, It. Venezia, G. Venedig, L. Venetia (from the Veneti).] A seaport, capital of the province of Venice, Italy, situated in the Lagune (lagoons) in a bay of the Adriatic, on 117 small islands, in lat. 45° 26′ N., long 12° 20′ E. The islands are separated by 150 canals and connected by 378 bridges. The city is celebrated for its situation, its palaces, and its works of art. Its trade is important, and it has manufactures of glass, gold- and silver-work, mosaic, silk, velvet, cotton, etc. The commerce is mostly by water. The Grand Canal (which see) being the principal thoroughfare. The most famous church (see Mark, St., Basilica of) stands on the Piazza of St. Mark, where also are the Procuratie (or procurators') palaces, the campanile (see Campanile of St. Mark), and clock-tower; while the adjoining Piazzetta is bordered by the palace of the doges (see Doges' Palace) and the former library (see Library of St. Mark). The Merceria Reale or Procuratie Nuove, San Giovanni e Paolo, or San Zanipolo, is a fine large Pointed church with a light and lofty interior: it is done at the crossing. It was the usual burial-place of the doges. Among the finest tombs are those of Pietro Mocenigo, Michele Morosini, and Andrea Vendramin—the last a masterpiece of the early Renaissance, by Mauro del Pirani, designer of the Certosa Pisano, and begun in 1250, is a large church of brick with a fine arcaded apse and a good campanile. The spacious and intelligently arranged interior contains many fine tombs and interesting tombs. The Church of San Giorgio degli Schiavoni, built in 1551 for the lay brotherhood of the Dalmatians, is famous for the early and highly characteristic paintings by Carpaccio which adorns its interior. The Church of San Salvatore, outside a grotesque Renaissance production, but well proportioned and classical in the interior, contains the tomb of the Doge Francesco Dandolo. Venice. There are many other notable churches. The Palazzo Contarini Fasan, on the Grand Canal, a small house, dated on the north E. by restoration of 1421, is the richest example of Venetian 15th-century Pointed work. The Palazzo Foscari is the finest example of Venetian Pointed architecture of the 15th century. The Palazzo Ducale, or Doges' Palace, built in 1481, is the finest example of a private building of the early Renaissance in Venice. Among other objects of interest are the Public Gardens (which see), the Quay Riva degli Schiavoni, the Rialto (which see), and the Academy of Fine Arts. The Venetian islands are said to have become refuges from the Barbarian invasions as early as 421, and 810 from the Franks. The dogate was instituted in or about 697. The first permanent settlement was made on the site of Venice in the 9th century. Venice became the intermediate power between the Byzantine empire and that of the West. The title of Duke of Dalmatia was assumed by the doge about 998. The possession of Venice became one of the greatest commercial powers of the world, especially after the overthrow of the Byzantine empire in 1204, and the establishment of the Latin empire of Constantinople. It had a long and bitter struggle with Genoa. It was governed by a doge, great council, senate, and after 1310 by the Council of Ten. In the 14th and 15th centuries it acquired Treviso, Vicenza, Padua, Verona, Udine, Brescia, Bergamo, and other places in northeastern Italy. It was at its height in the 15th century, and held various possessions in Dalmatia, Greece, and the islands of the Archipelago, Cyprus, etc., especially in the 16th century (Titian, Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, Giorgione, Bellini, Sansovino, Palladio, Da Ponte); and lost to the Turks in the 15th and 16th centuries. Candia, with Suboea, Cyprus, Corfu, and other islands. The League of Cambrai was formed against Venice in 1508. Venice took a leading part in the victory of Lepanto in 1571; lost Crete to the Turks in 1669; gained victories in the Morea under Morosini at the end of the 17th century; lost the Morea in 1718; was entered by Napoleon in 1797; was ceded with Venetia to Austria by the treaty of Campo-Formio in 1797; was ceded to the kingdom of Italy in 1805, and ceded back to Austria in 1814; and became part of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom in 1815. The republic of Venice, under the leadership of Manin, was proclaimed in 1848. It was besieged and taken by Austria in 1849, and was ceded to the kingdom of Italy in 1866. Population (1892), 149,500.

Venice, Gulf of. The northwestern arm of the Adriatic Sea.

Venice as Queen of the Sea. An effective and skilfully painted allegorical picture by Tintoretto, on the ceiling of the Sala del Collegio in the ducal palace at Venice.

Venice of the East. A name occasionally given to Bangkok.

Venice of the North. A name sometimes given to Stockholm and to Amsterdam.

Venice of the West. An occasional name of Glasgow.

Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discovered. A tragedy by Otway, printed in 1682. The plot is from St. Réal's "Histoire de la Conjuration du Marquis de Bedamar."

Venlo, or Venloo (ven-lō'). A town in the province of Limburg, Netherlands, situated on the Meuse in lat. 51° 23′ N., long. 6° 9′ E. It has varied manufactures and an extensive trade in swine. It was formerly strongly fortified. In 1473 it was taken by Charles the Bold, and in 1581 by Maximilian I. Later it was reduced by the Netherlands. It was besieged by Charles V. in 1543, and capitulated under favorable conditions (the "Accord of Venloo"): was taken by the Netherlands and by the Prince of Parma in 1586, and by Prince Henry of Orange in 1632; was taken from the French by the Allies under Marlborough, Aug. 23, 1702; fell to Austria by the peace of Baden in 1714; was restored to the Netherlands in 1715; was taken by the French Oct. 26, 1794, and incorporated in France in 1801; was restored to the Netherlands by the peace of Paris in 1814: was taken by Belgium Sept. 26, 1830, and was again restored in 1839. Population, 11,397.

Venn (ven), or the High Venn. A desolate plateau chiefly in the Rhine Province, Prussia, on the frontier of Belgium, near the towns Montjoie and Malmedy. Elevation, about 2,000 feet.

Venn, John. An English contemporary writer and lecturer on moral science. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, in 1857, and was ordained in 1858. Among his works are "The Logic of Chance, etc." (1866), "On some of the Characteristics of Belief, scientific and Religious" (1870), "Symbolic Logic" (1881), "Principles of Empirical or Inductive Logic" (1889).

Vennachar (ven'a-chär), Loch. An expansion of the river Teith in Perthshire, Scotland, east of Loch Katrine. Length, 3¼ miles.

Venosa (vā-nō'sä). A town in the province of Potenza, Italy, 23 miles north of Potenza: the Roman Venusia. It was the birthplace of Horace. Population, about 8,000.

Venta, or Venta Belgarum (ven'tä bel-gā'rum). The Roman name of Winchester.

Ventimiglia (ven-tē-mēl'yä). A seaport in the province of Porto-Maurizio, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean, close to the French frontier, 17 miles east-northeast of Nice. Population (1881), 4,195.

Ventnor (vent'nor). A watering-place in the Isle of Wight, England, situated on the southern coast 9 miles south-southeast of Newport: noted for its mild climate. Population (1891), 5,817.

Ventose (voñ-tōz'). [F., 'the windy.'] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the sixth month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 with Feb. 19; in 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 with Feb. 20; and in 12 with Feb. 21.

Ventoux (voñ-tō'). Mont. An outlying summit of the Alps, in southeastern France, northeast of Avignon. Height, 6,270 feet.

Venus (vē'nus). 1. In Roman mythology, the goddess of beauty and love, more especially sensual love: she comes in time to be of importance as a Roman goddess until, at a comparatively late period, she was identified with the Greek Aphrodite. She is represented as the highest ideal of female beauty, and was naturally a favorite subject with poets and artists. Some of her statues (see below) being among the noblest remains of classical sculpture.

2. The most brilliant of the planets, being frequently visible to the naked eye by daylight. It is the second from the sun and next within the earth's orbit, performing its sidereal revolution in 224.7008 days: its distance from the sun is 0.723332 that of the earth. The synodical revolution is made in 584 days. Its orbit is the most nearly circular of those of the major planets, the greatest equation of the center being only 47′ 3″. The inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic is 3° 23.5′, and the earth passes through the ascending node on Dec. 7. The mass of Venus (which is not very closely ascertained) is about $\frac{1}{400000}$ that of the sun, or $\frac{1}{411}$ that of the earth. Its diameter is a little smaller than that of our planet, which substends an angle of 32″.827 at the sun's center, while Venus at the same distance has a semidiameter of 8″.98 by the mean of the best micrometric measures, or 8″.40 according to the observations at its transit over the sun. Taking the mean of these (which are the best in opposite ways, by parallactic and transit observations) the diameter of Venus about that of the earth. Its volume is about $\frac{9}{10}$, its mass about $\frac{4}{5}$, and gravity at its surface about $\frac{9}{10}$ the same quantities for the earth. It receives 1.9 as much light and heat from the sun as we, and the tidal action of the latter is about $\frac{5}{12}$ times as great as upon the earth. The period of rotation of Venus is set down in many books as 23 hours and 56 minutes; but recent observations have led some editors to the confident conclusion that the time period [illegible] but a little of 25 days, so that day and night [illegible] two lunar years. No satellite of Venus has ever been seen. Numerous observations of one were reported in the 18th century, but all these have been fairly shown to be spurious stars, except one, which was probably an asteroid. The symbol for Venus is ♀, supposed to represent the goddess's mirror.

Venus, Mountain of, or Venusberg. The Hörselberg, between Eisenach and Gotha, with its whose caverns (the Hörselhöhle), according to mediæval legend, Venus held her court with heathen splendor and revelry. Of those who, charmed by music and sensuous allurements, entered her abode, none ever returned except Tannhäuser. See Tannhäuser.

Venus and Adonis. A poem by Shakspere, published in 1593.

Venus and Adonis. 1. A painting by Guercino (1647), in the Museum at Dresden. Venus comes suddenly upon the body of Adonis, who lies with torn flank and muscles freely indicated, of grief. Cupid drags up the boar from underside by the ear.

2. A painting by Rubens, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. In the center of a glade, Adonis, in the act of his hunting-spear, struggles with Venus and Cupid, who strive to hold him back. In the background are seen Venus's chariot drawn by swans, and several hunting-dogs.

3. A painting by Paolo Veronese, in the royal Museum at Madrid. Venus reclines, holding in her lap the head of the sleeping Adonis.

Venus Callipyge (ka-lip'i-jē). [Gr. καλλίπυγη, with beautiful buttocks.] A late Greek statue, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The title is a misnomer, as there is nothing to show about the figure. She stands with the weight on the left leg, and with the uplifted left hand raises the drapery from behind, at the same time looking over her right shoulder.

Venus Genetrix (jen'e-triks). [L., 'she who has borne or produced.'] 1. A Roman copy of a Greek original held to represent a celebrated type by Alcamenes, in the Louvre, Paris. The goddess is clad in a very light Ionian tunic, and with the raised right arm holds her himation from behind toward her head, forming the Greek gesture symbolic of marriage. The left hand extends the apple.

2. An antique marble statue, in the Vatican Museum, held to be an excellent copy of the bronze cult-statue by Arcesilaus which stood in the temple of Venus on the Forum Julium. The figure is fully draped in very thin, clinging drapery: she extends an apple with her left hand, and with the right raises the mantle over her shoulder toward the head — the symbolical marriage gesture.

Venusia (ve-nū'si-ā). The ancient name of Venosia.

Venus of Arles. A Greek statue found at Arles in 1651, now in the Louvre, Paris. The goddess is represented standing, undraped to the hips, with the head slightly inclined toward the left.

Venus of Capua. A beautiful antique statue, of the type of the famous Venus of Melos, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The goddess wears a stephane, and is undraped to her hips. It is a Roman copy of a Greek original.

Venus of Cnidus. The best antique reproduction of the type of the famous statue by Praxiteles, in the Vatican, Rome. The figure is nude; the drapery is held in the left hand, and falls over a beautiful vase. The existing drapery about the legs is of tin painted white. The arms are restored.

Venus of Medici. A late antique Greek original statue of marble, probably of the time of Augustus, in the Tribuna of the Uffizi, Florence. It is a very graceful, highly finished figure of the goddess, undraped as Anadyomene, with her arms held before her body, one hand behind her feet. While without the dignity of earlier Greek work, it has long ranked as a canon of female beauty.

Venus of Melos. A famous Greek statue in the Louvre, Paris, perhaps the most admired single existing work of antiquity. It was found in 1820 in the island of Melos, and in date appears to fall between the time of Phidias and that of Praxiteles, or about 400 B.C. The statue represents a nude woman, undraped to the hips, standing with the weight on the right foot and with the head turned slightly toward the left. The arms are broken off, and there is a dispute as to their original position. Also called the Venus of Milo.

Venus of Syracuse. A Greek statue of Venus Anadyomene, of the 3d century B.C., in the Museo Nazionale at Syracuse, Sicily. The statue is headless; the only drapery is a piece of light tissue blown back by the wind, and retained by the right hand.

Venus of the Capitol. A notable Greek original statue, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. The goddess is undraped, with her arms in the position of those of the Venus of Medici, and her drapery thrown over a vase beside her. The motive is a variation of the type of the Venus of Cnidus.

Venus of the Hermitage. A noted antique statue of Parian marble, found in Rome in 1850, and now in the Hermitage, St. Petersburg. It is a very close replica, but slightly restored, of the Venus of Medici, but is somewhat less affected in pose, though harder in type.

Venus of the Shell. A painting by Titian (1520), in Bridgewater House, London. The goddess wrings her hair as she rises from the sea, in which she is still immersed to her thighs. The modeling is remarkable, despite the strong light on all sides, and the color is admirable. The picture has its name from the small shell floating beside the figure.

Venus of Urbino. A masterpiece by Titian, in the Tribuna of the Uffizi, Florence: a very graceful figure reclining on a white-draped couch, with beautifully warm and transparent fleshtints. It is the portrait of Eleonora Gonzaga, duchess of Urbino.

Vêpres Siciliennes (vâprsē-sē-lyen'). Les. [F., 'Sicilian Vespers' (which see).] 1. An opera by Verdi, produced at Paris in 1855, and in England as "I Vespri Siciliani" in 1859. — 2. A play by Casimir Delavigne.

Vera (vā'rä), Augusto. Born at Amelia, Umbria, Italy, May 4, 1813; died at Naples, July 13, 1885. An Italian Hegelian philosopher, professor at Naples. He translated various works of Hegel into French, and wrote "Problème de la certitude" (1845), "An Inquiry into Speculative and Experimental Science" (1836), "Essais de philosophie hégélienne" (1864), etc.

Vera Cruz (ve'rä krōz; Sp. pron. vā'rä krōth). ['True cross.'] A maritime state of Mexico, bounded by the Gulf of Mexico and the states of Tamaulipas, San Luis Potosí, Hidalgo, Puebla, Oajaca, Chiapas, and Tabasco. Capital, Jalapa. The surface is mountainous, except the coastbelt. Area, 27,534 square miles. Population (1893), 641,824.

Vera Cruz. A seaport in the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, situated on the Gulf of Mexico in lat. 19° 12′ north, long. 96° 9′ west: defended by the castle of San Juan de Ulúa. It is the principal seaport of Mexico, and the port of export for over half of all Mexican products. It was founded by Cortes near the present site (see Villa Rica), was made a city in 1615; was bombarded and taken by the French in 1838, and by the Americans under Scott in 1847; and was taken by the allies in 1861. Population (1889), 24,000.

Veragua (vā-rä'gwä), or Veraguas (vā-rä'-gwäs). From the name of a river, or perhaps of an Indian town.] A region in the western part of the Isthmus of Panama, near the Gulf of Chiriqui. It was named by Columbus, who discovered it in 1502 and attempted to found a settlement there, but was driven off by the Indians. It was included in Castilla del Oro, granted to Diego Nicuesa, Duke of Veragua, with a grant of twenty-five leagues square in Veragua, and the island of Jamaica, in fief. In 1536 he was deprived of the fief, but retained the title of Duke of Veragua, with a claim of the Indies, and a pension. Diego Columbus, the grandson of the discoverer, died childless in 1578, and with him the male line of Columbus came to an end. A lawsuit for the succession to the titles followed; it lasted thirty years, and was settled in favor of the descendants of Isabel, sister of Luis Columbus. This line ceased in 1753, and the title of Duke of Veragua was settled on Don Luis Colon de Francesca, sister of the Diego Columbus who had died in 1578. The present Duke of Veragua (born 1837) visited the United States in 1892, and was received with high honors as the representative of the family.

Vercingetorix (vėr-sin-jet'o-riks). Put to death about 45 B.C. A heroic chief of the Arverni in Gaul, the leader of the great rebellion against the Romans in 52 B.C. He gained various successes against Cæsar, but was besieged by him in Alesia and surrendered in 52. He was exhibited in Cæsar's triumph in Rome in 46, and then by Cæsar's order beheaded.

Verd, Cape. See Cape Verd.

Verdant Green (vėr'dant grēn), Mr., Adventures of. A novel by Edward Bradley (under the pseudonym of Cuthbert Bede), published in 1853.

Verden (fer'den). A town in the province of Hannover, Prussia, situated on the Aller 21 miles southeast of Bremen. It has a cathedral, and was formerly the seat of a bishopric. It became a Swedish duchy in 1648, and passed to Hannover in 1715. Population (1890), 8,719.

Verdi (ver'dē). Giuseppe. Born at Roncole (near Busseto), duchy of Parma, Italy, Oct. 10, 1813. A celebrated Italian operatic composer. He received his musical education at Busseto and Milan; was appointed organist at Roncole when 10 years old; settled in Milan in 1838; and has lived in later life in Genoa and at his villa Sta. Agata (near Busseto). He was a member of the Italian Parliament for a short time in 1860, and was elected senator for life, but never attended a sitting. His chief operas are "Nabucodonosor" (1842), "I Lombardi" (1843), "Ernani" (1844), "I due Foscari" (1845), "Attila" (1845), "Macbeth" (1847; revised 1865), "Louisa Miller" (1849), "Rigoletto" (1851), "Il Trovatore" (1853), "La Traviata" (1853), "Les Vêpres Siciliennes" (1855), "Simon Boccanegra" (1857; revised 1881), "Un ballo in maschera" (1859), "La forza del destino" (1862), "Don Carlos" (1867), "Aida" (1871), "Otello" (1887), Falstaff" (1893). His other works include "Requiem Mass" (1874) and other sacred compositions, etc.

Verdigris (vėr'di-grēs) River. A river in Kansas and the Indian Territory which joins the Arkansas 25 miles west of Tahlequah. Length, over 250 miles.

Verdon (ver-dōn'). A river in southeastern France which forms in large part the boundary between Basses-Alpes and Var. It joins the Durance 21 miles northeast of Aix. Length, about 100 miles.

Verdun (ver-dun'). A fortified town in the department of Meuse, France, situated on the Meuse in lat. 49° 9′ N.: the ancient Verodunum in Gaul. It manufactures confectionery, liquors, etc.; has a cathedral of the 12th century; and is strongly fortified. In the 10th century it passed to the German Empire; was made a free imperial city; was occupied by Henry II. of France in 1552, and with its territory was formally annexed to France in 1648. It was held a short time by the Prussians in 1792; and capitulated to the Prussians in Nov., 1870. Population (1891), commune, 18,852.

Verdun, Treaty of. A treaty made at Verdun in 843 by the sons of Louis le Débonnaire. Lothaire was confirmed as emperor, and received Italy and the region lying in general west of the Rhine and Alps and east of the Rhone, Saone, Meuse, and Schelde. Ludwig the German received the region between the Rhine and the Elbe (the nucleus of Germany); and Charles the Bald obtained the region west of Lothaire's dominions (the nucleus of France).

On his (Louis the Pious's) death the sons flew to arms, and the first of the dynastic quarrels of modern Europe was fought out on the field of Fontenay. In the partition treaty of Verdun which followed, the Teutonic principle of equal division among heirs triumphed over the Roman one of the transmission of an indivisible empire.

Verocchio, or Verrocchio (ve-rok'kē-ō), Andrea (Andrea Cioni di Michele). Born at Florence, 1435; died at Venice, 1488. An Italian sculptor, the most noted pupil of Donatello. He was early apprenticed to Antonio Rossellino as a goldsmith, from whom he took his name (Verrocchio, the chisel). He was a painter as well as a sculptor, but only one picture remains: the "Baptism of our Lord," in the Academy in Florence. In 1467 he did a equestrian statue of the doge of the society of the Pomo in Florence; for Lucadella Robbia. From 1471 to 1476 (months at each) he was in Rome. Immediately after his return to Florence, in 1476, Verocchio modeled and cast his famous little statue of David. From 1471 to 1472 he worked upon the monument of Cosimo and Piero de' Medici for the sacristy of San Lorenzo. The last work upon which he was employed was the equestrian statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni (or Colleone), captain-general of the Venetian forces, who died at Bergamo, leaving his silver, furniture, arms, horses, and the sum of 216,000 florins to the republic of Venice, on condition that his statue should be set up in the Piazza di San Marco (it was really placed in the Campo de' Santi Giovanni e San Marco). Verocchio had nearly finished the horse when he died. The Colleoni was later finished by Leopardi. Lorenzo di Credi, Perugino, Vinci, and Giorgione were his pupils.

Verona. The capital of the province of Verona, Italy, situated on the Adige in lat. 45° 26′ N., long. 11° E. It is strongly fortified. It contains a Roman amphitheater, depaired almost completely of its ornamental exterior, but remaining in its general shape perfect in its vaults and caves, and still in current use. It is 3 stories 95 feet) high, built of white and red marble with brick substructure of concrete, and could seat about 22,000 people. The greater axis is 506 feet, the less 405; the arena is 248 by 145 feet. The arena could be flooded for the naumachiæ. The Porta Borsari is a Roman arch. The church of Sant' Anastasia is one of the finest Italian brick churches of the 13th century, with a beautiful recessed doublearched sculptured portal. The character is Gothic. The interior has very high wide nave arches. The tribunal is represented merely by an open circle in every bay, and the cleastory by an ornamented sexfoil. The Castel Vecchio is a large battlemented citadel built by Cangi della Scala. The della Scala in 1355, now used as a barracks. It is connected with the arsenal by a picturesque contemporaneous battlemented gate. The bridge of Castel Vecchio has equal arches, the largest with a span of over 100 feet. The cathedral is, as it now stands, of the 12th century. The chief entrance-porch has four columns, two of them resting on griffins, and supposed to be Lombard. The portal is guarded by the Paladins of Charlemagne. The interior has clustered columns and pointed arches, with some excellent frescos: the Chapel of Saint Agatha has a beautiful marble altar and sculptured shrine; the fine Renaissance choir, with curved colonnade, is by Sammicheli. The Lombard baptistery has a great octagonal marble font, richly sculptured with reliefs and arcades. The cloister, with coupled columns, retains a fine Roman mosaic and a column of the temple of Minerva. The palace of the Scaligers is now used for the law-courts and jail. It has a picturesque court and staircase, and a fine brick campanile of the 13th century (172 feet high). Below, it is plain and square; above, it has in each face 3 triple arches on a bold corbeled cornice. The crown is a recessed octagonal arcaded lantern of two stories. The tombs of the Scaligers form a unique assemblance of family tombs of the 13th and 14th centuries. The two chief of these monuments are those of Mastino II. and of can Signorio della Scala. Verona was a Roman colony and important city, and was the residence of Theodoric (Dietrich of Bern, i. e. Verona), and of Lombard and later kings. It became one of the chief Venetian cities; was ruled by the Scala family in the 13th and 14th centuries; passed to Venice in 1405; played an important part in the history of art in the 15th and 16th centuries; was taken by the French in 1796; was ceded to Austria in 1797; and was held by Austria until 1866. It was one of the four famous fortresses of the Quadrilateral. It was the birthplace of Catullus, Cornelius Nepos, Vitruvius, and the elder Pliny. Population (1890), 69,590.

Verona, Congress of. A congress of representatives from the principal European governments, held at Verona Oct.–Dec., 1822; occasioned by the disturbances in Spain and southeastern Europe. It was attended by the monarchs of Prussia, Austria, Russia, and Sardinia, the Duchess of Sardinia, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Montmorency, and others. Metternich presided. The chief result was the armed intervention of France in Spain in 1823.

Veronese (vā-rō-nā'zā) or Paolo Cagliari. Born at Verona, 1528; died at Venice, April 19, 1588. A celebrated Italian painter of the Venetian school. His first considerable commissions were executed at Mantua. In 1555 he went to Venice, where he remained. His first commission here was the "Consecration of the Virgin," and four other subjects, for the convent of St. Sebastian. In 1565 Titian supported his claims to the award of the decoration of the Library of St. Mark. In 1565 Veronese went to Rome. In 1573 he was called before the Inquisition to answer a charge of blasphemy for introducing in a "Last Supper," painted for the friars of St. John and St. Paul, incident and decorative figures. He was obliged to paint out his dwarfs, German soldiers, etc., and to paint the pictures it hangs in the Academy. After the fire of 1577 he was commissioned to paint the ceiling of the council-chamber in the doge's palace. His works include "Marriage at Cana" (Louvre), "Feast in the House of Simon" (Louvre), "Europa and the Bull" (London), "Leda and the Swan" (London), "Death of Adonis" (London), "Supper at Emmaus," "Venice Enthroned," "Calling of St. Andrew," "Presentation of the Family of Darius to Alexander," "St. Helena's Vision" (both the last named in the National Gallery, London), and many others.

Veronica (ve-ron'i-ka), Saint. [A corrupted form of Berenice, Gr. Bερενικη, a woman's name. The name suggested the words vera icon, "true picture," and gave rise to the fable.] In Christian legend, a woman of Jerusalem, said to have died at Rome, who gave to Jesus on his way to Calvary a handkerchief to wipe his brow. He took it, upon it was miraculously left an impression of his face (the so-called Veronica). The legend probably arose in the 13th century. She is commemorated on Feb. 4.

Versailles (vėr-sälz'; F. pron. ver-sâ'y or ver-sâ'y). The capital of the department of Seine-et-Oise, France, 11 miles west-southwest of Paris. It contains a famous royal palace, consisting of a comparatively inconsiderable central portion built by Louis XIII., and of wide wings, colonnades, and connected structures, added chiefly by Louis XIV. The garden front is a quarter of a mile long, with only two stories and an attic in the main, although broken by a large projection in the middle, the general effect is monotonous. The court front is more diversified, though injured by the insertion of two neo-classical pavilions by Louis Philippe. A great part of the palace is now occupied by the Museum of French History, consisting chiefly of paintings; but some of its apartments are still preserved with the fittings of a royal residence. The chapel is well proportioned and sumptuous. The great gallery, called the Galerie des Glaces, is one of the finest rooms existing: it is 240 by 35 feet, and 42 high, adorned with marvels of gilding, and with ceiling-paintings by Lebrun representing the triumphs of Louis XIV. Here King William of Prussia was proclaimed German emperor in 1871. The council-chamber, the bedroom of Louis XIV., the antechamber of the Œil de Bœuf, the Petits Appartements of the queen, and the theatre are all historically and highly interesting. The gardens are the finest of their formal kind: they abound with monumental fountains profusely adorned with groups of sculpture: and supplied in model for those of half the palaces of Europe. (See Trianon.) Versailles was the meeting-place of the States-General in 1789. A popular tumult, Oct. 5–6, 1789, resulted in the removal of the royal family to Paris. Versailles was the seat of the French government 1871–79. It is the place of election of French presidents. Population (1891), 50,659.

Vespucci (ves-pō'chē), Amerigo, Latinized Americus Vespucius. Born at Florence, March 9, 1451: died at Seville, Feb. 22, 1512. An Italian navigator. He was the son of Nastagio Vespucci, a notary of Florence: received his education from his uncle, a Dominican friar; and became a clerk in the commercial house of the Medici. He was sent to Spain by his employers about 1490; and some years after appears to have entered the service of the commercial house of Juonato Berardi at Seville, of which he became a member in 1495. This house fitted out Columbus's second expedition (1493), and it has been suggested that Vespucci may have accompanied Columbus's first or second expedition, although the supposition is unsupported by any proof. Vespucci himself claims to have accompanied four expeditions to the New World, of each of which he wrote a narrative. Two of these sailed from Spain by order of Ferdinand in May, 1497, and May, 1499, respectively; the other two were despatched from Portugal by Emanuel in May, 1501, and May, 1503. The first expedition, on which he would appear to have held the post of astronomer, left Cadiz May 10 or 20, 1497, and after touching at the Canaries came to, at the end of twenty-seven days, a coast which we thought to be that of a continent." If this expedition is authentic, Vespucci reached the continent of America a week or two earlier than the Cabots and about fourteen months earlier than Columbus. His account of these expeditions was contained in a diary said to have been written after his fourth voyage, and entitled "Le Quattre Giornate," no portion of which is extant. He also wrote several letters to his former schoolfellow Soderini, gonfalonier of Florence, one of which remains in a Latin translation printed at St. Dié in 1507. A Waldseemüller (Hylacomylus), who made use of this letter in his "Cosmographiæ Introductio," published at St. Dié in the same year, was the first to suggest that the name America for the new continent, in honor of its supposed discoverer, Amerigo Vespucci.

It should first of all be noted that the sole authority for a voyage made by Vespucci in 1497 is Vespucci himself. All contemporary history, other than his own letters, is absolutely silent in regard to such a voyage, whether in the history in printed books, or in the archives of those kingdoms of Europe where the precious documents touching the earlier expeditions to the New World were deposited. . . . The fact is unquestioned that Vespucci, who had been a resident of Spain for some time, became in 1495 a member of the commercial house of Juonato Berardi at Seville, and that in January of the next year, as the public records show, he was paid a sum of money relative to a contract with Government which Berardi did not live to complete. The presumption is that he would not soon absent himself from his post of duty, where new and onerous responsibilities had been imposed upon him by the recent death of the senior partner of the house in which he was interested. But at any rate he is found there in the spring of 1497, Muñoz having ascertained that fact from the official records of expenses incurred in fitting out the ships for eastern expeditions, still preserved at Seville. Those records show that from the middle of April, 1497, to the end of May, 1498, Vespucci was busily engaged at Seville and San Lucar in the equipment of the fleet of four ships which sailed on his third voyage. The alibi, therefore, is complete. Vespucci could not have been absent from Spain from May, 1497, to Oct., 1498, the period of his alleged voyage. S. H. Gay, in Winsor's Narrative and Critical History [of America, II. 137, 142.

Vesta (ves'tä). [L., = Gr. Ἑστία, the goddess of the hearth.] One of the chief divinities of the ancient Romans, corresponding to the Greek Hestia. She was one of the 12 great Olympians, the virgin goddess of the hearth, presiding over both the private family altar and the central altar of the city, the tribe, or the race. She was worshiped in the Penates of every house, and, when the family assembled round the altar or hearth, which was in the center of the house, Æneas was said to have carried the sacred fire which was symbolized under Troy, and to have brought it to Italy, and it was preserved at Rome by the state in the sanctuary of the goddess which stood in the Forum. Her sacred fire was tended by maidens virgins, called vestals, who prevented it from becoming extinguished. The Roman temples of Vesta were circular, preserving the form of the primitive huts of the Latin races, because it was in such a hut that the sacred fire was first tended by the young girls while their parents and brothers were absent in the chase or pasture-ground.

The very fact that the Vesta worship is the most indubitable of the correspondences between the Greek and Roman mythologies is itself a proof of the rudimentary nature of their common civilisation. Only among the rudest of existing races tribes, such as the Australians, is it held a duty to keep alight the fire of the tribe, which if extinguished has to be obtained from some neighbouring tribe, as they are ignorant of the means of rekindling it. The Chippeways and Natchez Indians had an institution for keeping alight the tribal fire, certain persons being set aside and devoted to this occupation. The incorporation and endowment of the Vestal Virgins at Rome seems to be a survival of a similar practice, the social duty, originally devolving on the daughters of the house, obtaining a religious sanction as the service of the perpetual flame. Taylor, Aryans, p. 313.

Vesta. An asteroid (No. 4) discovered by Olbers at Bremen, March 29, 1807.

Vesta, Temple of. See Tivoli.

Vestini (ves-tī'ni). In ancient history, a people of central Italy, living east of the Sabines: probably of Sabine affinities. They became allied with the Romans about 300 B. C., and joined the Marsi in the Social War.

Vesulus (ves'ū-lus). The ancient name of Monte Viso.

Vesunna (ves-sun'ä). The ancient name of Périgueux.

Vesuvius (ve-sū'vi-us), Mount. [L. Vesuvius, It. Vesuvio, F. Vésuve, G. Vesuv.] The only active volcano on the continent of Europe, and the most noted one in the world, situated on the Bay of Naples, Italy, 9 miles southeast of Naples. It has two summits—the volcano proper (about 4,200 feet high), and Monte Somma to the north (3,730 feet). It is now reached by a wire-rope railway. It was regarded in ancient times as extinct. Successive earthquake shocks occurred in 63 A. D., and the first recorded eruption in 79, destroying Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiæ. The most destructive eruption since that time happened Dec. 16, 1631. Others, more or less notable, took place in 203, 472, 512, 685, about 1139, 1707, 1779, 1794, 1822, 1855, and 1872.

Vesuvius, Battle of. A victory gained near Mount Vesuvius, about 340 B. C., by the Romans under Manlius Torquatus and Decius Mus over the Latin League.

Veszprem (ves'prem), or Veszprim (ves'prim), G. Weissbrunn (vis'brön). The capital of the county of Veszprem, Hungary, 63 miles west-southwest of Budapest; the seat of a Roman Catholic bishopric. It has a trade in wine and grain. It was captured by Maximilian in 1490; by the Hungarians in 1491; by the Germans in 1527; by the Turks in 1552; by the Germans in 1598; by Grand Vizir Sinan in 1594; by the Imperialists in 1598; and by the Turks again in 1605, who finally lost it in 1683. Population (1890), 12,655.

Veta Madre (vā'tä mä'drā). [Sp., 'mother lode,' i. e. chief lode.] A celebrated silver lode, or system of lodes, near Guanajuato, Mexico. It is about 7 miles long. It was discovered in 1558, and Humboldt calculated that, up to 1800, it had yielded one fifth of the silver then current in the world. It has been worked to a great depth, and most of the shafts are now abandoned owing to the lack of drainage-machinery of sufficient power.

Vetancurt (vā-tän'kört), Agustin de. Born at Mexico City, 1620; died there, 1700. A Mexican Franciscan author. His most important work is "Teatro Mexicano" (4 parts in 2 vols., 1697–98), an ethnographical and historical account of New Spain. He published many other books, including biographies, theological treatises, and a grammar of the Nahuatl language. Also written Vetancur, Vetancour, etc.

Veterani Cave (va-ta-rä'nē kāv). A large cavern on the left bank of the Danube, in southern Hungary, about 12 miles from Alt-Orsova. It was defended for 45 days against an overwhelming Turkish force in 1690 by Baron Isolani, at the command of Count Veterani (whence its name).

Veto (vē'tō), Madame. A sobriquet given to Marie Antoinette during the French Revolution. She is mentioned by this name in "La Carmagnole."

Vevey, or Vevay (ve-vā'). [G. Fivis, L. Vibiscum.] A town in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, situated on Lake Geneva, at the mouth of the Veveyse, 12 miles east-southeast of Lausanne. It is a favorite resort of tourists, and is noted for its festival of vine-dressers. Population (1888), 8,144.

Vexin (ve-sañ'). An ancient territory in northern France, northwest of Paris. It was included partly in Normandy (the Norman Vexin) and partly in Ile-de-France (the French Vexin). Norman Vexin now forms part of the departments of Eure and Seine-Inférieure: its capital was Gisors. French Vexin forms part of the departments of Oise and Seine-et-Oise: its capital was Pontoise. Vexin was a county in the early middle ages. Part of it was granted to the Normans in 912, and part was attached to the crown. The latter was definitely acquired in the reign of Philip I.

Vézelay (vāz-lā'). [MI. Vizeliacus, Vezeliacus.] A small town in the department of Yonne, France, 25 miles south-southeast of Auxerre: noted for its abbey, founded in the 9th century. St. Bernard preached the second Crusade here in 1146, and it was the rendezvous of Richard the Lion-Hearted and Philip Augustus before starting for the third Crusade.

Vézère (vā-zār'). A river in France which joins the Dordogne 23 miles south-southeast of Périgueux. Length, about 120 miles.

Via Æmilia (vi'ä ē-mil'i-ä). [L., 'Emilian Way.' See Aemilius.] An important ancient Roman highway, the earliest in northern Italy, connecting Placentia (Piacenza) and Ariminum (Rimini), where it met the Flaminian Way. Later branches extended from Rimini to Bologna, and thence to Aquileia, and from Piacenza to Pavia, and the main road was extended from Piacenza to Milan and Acosta. The original highway was built by M. Æmilius Lepidus in 187 B. C., and is still in use.

Via Appia. See Appian Way.

Via Aurelia (ā-rē'li-ä). [L., 'Aurelian Way.'] One of the chief ancient Roman highways. It was built toward the close of the republic, exactly when is unknown, and extended from Rome for the most part along the coast to Pisa, where it was continued along the Ligurian shore to the Maritime Alps, and by Augustus was carried into Gaul. There are considerable remains of the road, notably along the Italian and French Riviera.

Via Cassia (kash'i-ä). [L., 'Cassian Way.'] An ancient Roman highway which extended from Rome through Etruria to Arretium (Arezzo), and thence to Florence and Lucca. It was in existence before the end of the republic, but the time of its construction is unknown.

Via Clodia (klō'di-ä). [L., 'Clodian Way.'] An ancient Roman highway of the time of the republic, extending though Etruria on a line about parallel with the Via Cassia. It was a branch of the Via Cassia, which it left about 10 miles from Rome, where its present still exists, and appears to have ended at Saturnia, passing through Braccianc and Bieda.

Via Dolorosa (vi'ä dol-o-rō'sä). [L., 'Dolorous Way.'] A name given by Christians to the road from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha.

Via Egnatia (eg-nā'shi-ä). An important ancient Roman military road, running from the coast of the Adriatic at Dyrrachium (Durazzo) through Illyria and Macedonia to Thessalonica, and thence by Philippi through Thrace to Cypsela (modern Ipsala). The date of its construction is unknown. Its length was 534 Roman miles. There are abundant remains of the road, especially near Salonica.

Via Flaminia. See Flaminian Way.

Via Latina (la-ti'nä). [L., 'Latin Way.'] One of the great highways leaving ancient Rome. It ran to Casilinum (near Capua), where it united with the Appian Way. A branch was later carried from Teanum to Beneventum. Both the Via Latina and the Appian Way left Rome by the Porta Capena. The Via Latina underlies Monte Cassino as a road for a long period before it was regularly constructed and paved. The invading forces of both Pyrrhus and Hannibal followed its course. There are extensive remains, not only of the paved way, but of the tombs of the many noblemen that lined it.

Via Mala (vē'ä mä'lä). A picturesque portion of the road leading up the valley of the Hinter Rhein, immediately south of Tusi, canton of Grisons, Switzerland. It traverses a deep and narrow chasm.

Viana (vē-ä'nä). A small town in the province of Navarre, Spain, situated near the Ebro opposite Logroño. Near here Cesare Borgia was defeated and slain in 1507.

Via Ostiensis (vi'ä os-ti-en'sis). [L., 'Ostian Way.'] The ancient highway from Rome to Ostia. It followed the left bank of the Tiber, cutting across the larger bends of the river.

Via Portuensis (pōr-tū-en'sis). The ancient highway from Rome to the new imperial seaport of Portus Trajani. Its course, which can still be followed, is along the right bank of the Tiber.

Via Prænestina (pren-es-ti'nä). [L., 'Prænestine Way.'] A very ancient highway from Rome through Gabii to Prænestе (Palestrina), whence it was continued to join the Via Latina at Anagnia. There are interesting remains.

Viardot (vyär-dō'), Louis. Born at Dijon, July 31, 1800: died at Paris, May 5, 1883. A French author. He studied law at Paris, became a journalist, and was manager of the Grand Opera 1838–41. With George Sand and Pierre Leroux he founded in 1841 the "Revue Independante." He wrote "Histoire des Arabes et des Maures d'Espagne" (1851), etc.

Viardot-Garcia (vyär-dō'gär-thē'ä), Michele Ferdinande Pauline. Born at Paris, July 18, 1821. A noted French opera-singer and actress, daughter of Manuel Garcia, sister of Malibran, and wife of L. Viardot. Her voice is a mezzo soprano. She was a pupil of her father and Manuel Garcia, and made her first appearance as a singer at Brussels in 1837. In 1839 she created the part of Fides in Meyerbeer's "Prophète," which she sang more than two hundred times in all the great cities of Europe. Among her other rôles are Rahel ("La Juive"), Orphée in Gluck's opera of that name (the part was restored to the contralto register, for which it was written, by Berlioz), Adelaïde, Desdemona, Norma, Cenerentola, Romeo, Lucia, Azucena, Zerlina, and many others. She retired from the operatic stage in 1863, and has since come only to concerts. Since 1871 she has lived in Paris, and has given her time to teaching. She has published songs, etc. Her three daughters and a son are all musicians.

Viareggio (vē-ä-red'jō). A seaport in the province of Lucca, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean 14 miles north-northwest of Pisa. It is a frequented watering-place. Population (1881), 10,190; commune, 12,735.

Via Salaria (vi'ä sa-lā'ri-ä). One of the most celebrated of ancient Roman highways. It ran from Rome up the Tiber valley to Reate (Rieti), then crossed the Apennines and descended the valley of the Tronto, past Ascoli, to Castrum Truentinum on the Adriatic. Here it branched, one road running north to Ancona and the other south to Adria. The date of this highway is unknown: it is undoubtedly very old, and existed as a route long before it was built as a public work.

Viau (vyō), Théophile de. Born near Agen, France, 1590: died at Paris, 1626. A French poet. He wrote the tragedy "Pyrame et Thisbé" (1617), and for his part in the authorship of "Parnasse Satirique" (1622) was condemned to death. His sentence was commuted to banishment. His complete works were published in 1856.

Viaud (vyō), Louis Marie Julien: pseudonym Pierre Loti. Born at Rochefort, Charente-Inférieure, Jan. 14, 1850. A French novelist. He was admitted to the French training-ship Earda in 1867, traveled extensively, and took part in several campaigns. He commands a steamer named Loti after an Indian flower. His novels are largely exotic in their subject-matter, and reveal forcibly the author's keen poetic instinct and ideality. Later works include "Azyadé" (1879), "Rarahu (la belle-poule-nacre)," the republication of which was entitled "Le mariage de Loti" (1880), "Le roman d'un Spahi" (1881), "Fleurs d'ennui," "Pasquala Inveitch—Suléima" (1882), "Mon frère Yves" (1883), "Les trois dames de la Kasbah" (1884), "Ramuntcho," "Matelot" (1886), "Madame Chrysanthème," "Propos d'exil" (1887), "Japoneries d'automne" (1889). Of late years he has also written "Au Maroc," "Le roman d'un enfant," and "Le livre de la pitié et de la mort"; and his most recent publications are "Fantôme d'Orient" (1892) and "Matelot" (1893). In 1891 he was elected by the French Academy to fill the seat left vacant by the death of Octave Feuillet.

Via Valeria (vi'ä va-lē'ri-ä). [L., 'Valerian Way.'] One of the principal highways of ancient Rome. It continued the Via Tiburtina, which led from Rome to Tibur (Tivoli), to Lake Fucinus and the Marsic territory, and was afterward extended to the Adriatic at the mouth of the Aternus. The line of this extension from as far as Cerfennia, near modern Goll' Armeno, on Lake Fucinus, is unknown; its continuation through the Apennines at Monte Imeto, and in the Aternus valley, was built by Claudius. Many portions of the roadway survive, with the ancient mile-stones and other remains.

Vibert (vē-bār'), Jehan Georges. Born at Paris, Sept. 30, 1840. A French genre-painter and writer, a pupil of Barrias and Pils. Among his works are "Entry of Bull Fighters" (with Zamacois, 1867), "Coquelin as Mascarille" (1874), "Grasshopper and Ant" (1875), "Monseigneur's Antechamber" (1876), "The Despair of Polichinelle" (1877), "The Abduction" (1879), "The Apotheosis of M. Thiers" (1878), "Committee on Moral Books" (New York), "Theological Discussion" (New York); many others are in the United States. In 1878 he also exhibited only in the exhibitions of the French Water-color Society, of which he was one of the founders. He has written a number of books on fencing, duelling, etc., and has also published "La science de la peinture" (1891).

Viborg (vē'borg). A town in Jutland, Denmark, in lat. 56° 27′ N.: probably the oldest town in Jutland. It has a cathedral, a spacious Romanesque basilica of the 12th century, thoroughly restored since 1864. It is built entirely of granite, with good architectural details, notably a Norman chevet. The very interesting crypt is entirely of the original construction. Population, 8,352.

Vicar of Bray, The. A well-known song written by an officer in the British army in the reign of George I. See Bray.

Vicar of Wakefield, The. A novel by Goldsmith, published in 1776: so called from its chief character, Dr. Primrose. In 1886 ninety-six editions had been published. It has been several times dramatized (as W. B. Wills (1850) as "Olivia").

Vicente (vē-sen'tā), Gil. Born about 1470: died 1537(?). A Portuguese author. He wrote pastorals and plays for the Portuguese court after 1502. His works in Portuguese and Spanish include comedies, farces, autos, and tragi-comedies.

Vicenza (vē-chent'zä). [L. Vicetia, MI., Vicentia.] The capital of the province of Vicenza, Italy, situated on the Bacchiglione, at its junction with the Retrone, in lat. 45° 33′ N., long. 11° 32′ E. It has considerable trade, and important silk manufactures; and is noted for its buildings by Palladio and others. The cathedral is a structure of the 11th century, with later alterations. The nave is of 10 feet span, and there are no aisles; the raised choir is approached by a fine flight of steps. On the Renaissance door on the north side is by Palladio, the lofty dome by Giulio Romano. The campanile is of the 13th century, on a Roman foundation. Vicenza was ruled by the Scala family and others from the time of the emperor Henry VII.; passed to Venice about 1404; revolted against Austria in 1848; and capitulated to Radetzky June 11, 1848. Population (1892), 40,000.

Vicenza. A province in the compartimento of Venetia, Italy. Area, 1,052 square miles. Population (1892), 436,538.

Vicenza, Duke of. See Caulaincourt.

Vich, or Vique (vēk). A town in the province of Barcelona, Spain, 38 miles north of Barcelona: the ancient Ausa. In 718 it was a cathedral and flourishing manufactures. In 713 it was destroyed by the Arabs, and was rebuilt by the Franks of the Spanish March in 795. On Feb. 19, 1810, it was unsuccessfully assaulted by the Spaniards under O'Donnell. Population (1887), 11,640.

Vichy (vē-shē'). [L. Vicus Calidus; also Aquæ Calidæ, hot springs.] A town and watering-place in the department of Allier, France, situated on the Allier 32 miles south by east of Monday. It has been celebrated since Roman times for its mineral springs (source-salin, Puits-carré, L'Hôpital, etc.) and is the most frequented watering place in France. Population (1891) commune, 19,876.

Vicinal Way (vis'i-nal wā). [L. Via Vicinalis, a field road used in common.] An old Roman road by which produce was brought from the farms of Essex to London. At first it left the city, walk-bouts, Street at Bishopsgate, later at Aldgate when that bridge was built. From Bishopsgate it ran eastward to Brooklyn (now Romford) in Essex, next to Caesaromagus (now Chelmsford); thence to Camomagus (now Kelvedon on the river Pant); and thence to Camulodunum, the first Roman colonia (now Colchester). The road crossed the Stour at Ad Ansam (now Stratford), and thence ran through Combretonium, near Woodford, to Sitomagus (now Ilmwich) on the coast, and terminated at Venta of the Iceni (now Caistor), near Norwich. From Norwich a direct road ran to Cambridge.

Vicksburg (vik's'berg). The capital of Warren County, Mississippi, situated on the Mississippi in lat. 32° 22′ N. It is the largest city in the State, and is the chief place on the river between Memphis and New Orleans. It has important manufactures and a large export of cotton. It was of great strategic importance in the first part of the Civil War, and an unsuccessful attempt to capture it was made by Grant and Sherman at the close of 1862. Grant's advance on Vicksburg from the south and east began in April, 1863. Federal victories were gained at Port Gibson May 1, Raymond May 12, Jackson May 14, Champion Hill May 16, and Black May 17, over the Confederates under Johnston and Pemberton. Vicksburg was invested May 18; unsuccessful assaults were made May 19 and 22, and the Confederates (30,000 under Pemberton) surrendered July 4, 1863. Population (1890), 13,373.

Vicuña Mackenna (vē-kōn'yä mäk-kā'nä), Benjamin. Born at Santiago, Aug. 25, 1831: died on his estate of Santa Rosa de Colmo, Jan. 25, 1886. A Chilean historian. He was engaged in the revolts of 1851–52, was obliged to leave the country, traveling in the United States and Europe until 1856, when he was allowed to return. He engaged in journalism, but was again banished 1858–59; was elected to Congress 1864; and was special envoy to Peru and the United States 1866–67. In 1875 he was the candidate of the liberal party for the presidency. His works, which are numerous, relate mainly to the history of Chile: they are written in popular style, but are rarely accurate. Among the best-known are "El ostracismo de los Carreras" (1857), "Historia de la revolucion de Peru" (1860), "Memoria sobre el general O'Higgins" (1860), "Historia de la administracion Montt" (1862), "Historia de Chile" (1868), and "Campañas de Arica y Tacna" (1881).

Vida (vē'dä), Marco Girolamo. Born at Cremona, Italy, about 1480: died Sept. 27, 1566. An Italian Latin poet. He was made by Louis X. prior in Frascati, and by Clement VII. in 1532 bishop of Alba. His Latin poems include the religious epic "Christias" (in 6 books, 1535), "De arte poetica" (1527), "De bombyce" (1527; on silk-culture), "De ludo scacchorum" (1527; on chess), etc.

Vidal (vē-dal'), Pierre. Born at Toulouse: flourished about 1175–1215. A Provençal troubadour. He accompanied Richard the Lion-Hearted to Cyprus in 1190.

Pierre Vidal of Toulouse, a troubadour who followed King Richard to the third Crusade, was no less celebrated for his extravagant devotion to the fair sex than for his valor. Love and vanity, amongst the poets, seem by turns to assume such an empire over the feelings as almost to shake the reason. None, however, have been known to display more perfect madness than Pierre Vidal. Persuaded that he was beloved by every lady, and that he was the bravest of all knights he was the Quixote of poetry. His ridiculous amours, and his extravagant rhodomontades, heightened by the treacherous pleasantries of pretended friends, led him into the strangest errors. During the Crusade he was persuaded at Cyprus by a man of a Greek lady who asserted that she was allied to one of the families which had filled the throne of Constantinople; and this circumstance furnished him with sufficient grounds for believing that he was himself entitled to the purple. He assumed the title of Emperor, and bestowed that of Empress upon his wife. He had a throne carried before him, and he destined the produce of his savings and his songs to assist him in the conquest of his empire. . . . On his return into Provence, a new amour led him into a still wilder piece of extravagance. He fell in love with a lady of Carcassonne, called Louve de Penautier, and in honour of her he assumed the surname Loup. To give himself a better title to the appellation, he clothed himself in a wolf's skin, and persuaded the shepherds to chase him with dogs over the mountains. He had the perseverance to suffer this strange pursuit to the last extremity, and was carried half dead to his mistress, who was not much moved by so singular a piece of devotion.

Simonde, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 136.

Vidar (vē'där). In Norse mythology, a powerful god, son of Odin and the giantess Grid.

Vidaurri (vē-dour'rē), Santiago. Born in Mexico about 1803; executed in the city of Mexico, July 8, 1867. A Mexican general and politician. He was a member of the government of Maximilian, and was condemned as a traitor.

Vidocq (vē-dōk'), François Eugène. Born at Arras, France, July 23, 1775; died in Belgium, May, 1857. A French detective and adventurer. In early life he was a soldier and thief; was several times imprisoned; became connected with the Paris police as a detective in 1809; and resigned as chief of the detective force in 1832. In 1833 he started a private detective establishment, soon closed by the government. He was the reputed author of "Mémoires" and other works.

Viehoff (vē'hof), Heinrich. Born at Büttgen, near Neuss, April 28, 1804; died at Treves, April 25, 1886. A German historian of literature and translator. He wrote lives of Goethe and Schiller, and a "Handbuch der deutschen Nationalliteratur," and translated from Racine, Shakspere, etc.

Vieira (vē-ā'rä), Antonio. Born at Lisbon, Feb. 6, 1608; died at Bahia, Brazil, July 18, 1697. A celebrated Portuguese missionary, pulpit orator, author, and publicist. He was taken to Bahia when a child; entered the Jesuit order there in 1625; became celebrated as a pulpit orator, and in 1641 returned to Portugal, where he was governor of Brazil, Maracanhas. There he attracted crowds to his sermons; was nominated royal preacher in 1644; was an influential councilor of the king; and was sent on important diplomatic missions to Paris, The Hague, and Rome. In 1653 he was ordered to the missions of Maranhão; returned to Lisbon for a short time to secure protection for the Indians in 1654; was again in favor with the king, who in 1655 gave him an uprising against the missionaries; and was sent a prisoner to Portugal. There his eloquence prevailed with the court, and the governor was sent to Maranhão with orders to protect the Jesuits. Vieira remained in Portugal, but fell into ill favor with the court; and for a book which he published, "Esperanças de Portugal," was tried before the Portuguese Inquisition, imprisoned 1665–67, and forbidden to preach, but was soon reinstated. In 1670–75 he was in Rome, where his brilliant oratory brought him renewed fame. He returned to Lisbon in 1681, and was promoted of his order there from 1688. Vieira's published works consist mainly of sermons and letters, the latter often of much political value. He was the first, if not the greatest, of the Portuguese prose authors.

Villegaignon (vēl-gā-nyón'), Chevalier de (Nicolas Durand). Born in 1510: died near Normours, Jan. 9, 1571. A French soldier. He served against the Turks and Algerians; was vice-admiral of Brittany; and in 1555 was given command of the expedition sent by Coligny to found a colony in Brazil. He sailed from Havre, July 12, with two ships, and in Nov. entered the Bay of Rio de Janeiro and occupied the island which is still known by his name, establishing friendly relations with the Indians. Coligny had intended the colony as a refuge for Protestants, but it was made up of different sects, including Catholics: quarrels arose, and Villegaignon, whose affiliations were doubtful, expelled the Calvinists. In 1558 he went to Europe, collected forces for reinforcements, but never returned, and the colony was destroyed by the Portuguese in 1567 (see Sá, Mem de). Villegaignon published (in Latin) works on the wars in which he had been engaged, etc. Also written Villegagnon.

Villegaignon (vē-lē-gan-yōn'), Ilha de. A small island in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, fronting the city. It was occupied by the French who formed the first settlement in Brazil. (See Chevalier de Villegaignon, above.) During the empire it was fortified, and it was a strongly contested point during the naval rebellion of 1893–94.

Villehardouin (vēl'-är-dō-an'), Geoffroi de. Born presumably on his ancestral estates near Troyes, Champagne, between 1150 and 1165: died probably in 1212. A French chronicler. The only thing known concerning him before the time of the fourth Crusade (1202–04) is that he was Marshal of Champagne in 1191. When his liege lord Thibaut III. joined the Crusade preached in 1199, Villehardouin took service under him, and gained special reputation in negotiating with the Venetians for the transport of the Crusaders by sea to the Holy Land. He followed the Crusade through all its disasters, and chronicled all the events of importance that extended over the period of 1198–1207. His "Chronique" is considered trustworthy from a historical point of view, but is more deserving still for its literary merit, while it is the oldest of the documents in original French prose. The best edition of this "Chronique" was made by M. Natalis de Wailly under the title "La conquete de Constantinople, par Geoffroi de Villehardouin, texte original accompagné d'une traduction" (Paris, 1872).

Villela Barboza (vē-lē'lä bär-bō'zä), Francisco, Marquis of Paranaguá, from 1825. Born at Rio de Janeiro, Nov., 1800: died there, Sept. 11, 1846. A Brazilian politician of the conservative party. He was deputy to the Portuguese Cortes 1821–22, and during the reign of Pedro I. was repeatedly a member of the cabinet. The unpopular acts of the empress, which led to the revolution of March 6, 1831, were due to Barboza's advice. He was a poet of some repute.

Villèle (vē-lāl'), Comte Jean Baptiste Séraphin Joseph de. Born at Toulouse, France, Aug. 14, 1773: died there, March 13, 1854. A French statesman and financier. He served in early life in the navy; after the restoration was a leader of the ultra-royalists; entered the cabinet in 1820; became minister of finance in 1821, and was premier 1822–28.

Villemain (vēl-man'), Abel François. Born at Paris, June 11, 1790: died there, May 8, 1870. A French writer. On graduating from the Lycée Louis-le-Grand, he studied law. In 1810 he was called to the chair of rhetoric at the Lycée Charlemagne, and held it to 1826 filled the chair in French eloquence at the Sorbonne. His success as a teacher was such that his name was associated with those of Cousin and Guizot, thus forming the famous trio known as "les trois professeurs." He won his first laurels as a writer in successful competition before the French Academy for the prize offered for the best essay entitled "Eloges de Montesquieu." The prize in took the prize in 1814 with his "Avantages et inconvénients de la critique," and in 1816 with his "Eloges de Montesquieu." The French Academy elected him a member in 1821. The success of his "Histoire de Cromwell" (1819) led him gradually into a political life, so that after 1824 he gave up his rhetorical chair. From 1827 to 1830 he was almost continuously minister of public instruction. Besides a couple of essays on Grecian themes, entitled "Lascaris, ou les Grecs du XVe siècle" and "Essai sur l'état des Grecs depuis la conquete musulmane" (1825), Villemain wrote several shorter papers and articles that were ultimately published in book form: prominent among these writings stand his "Nouveaux contes-moraux (Histoire et de littérature" (1856). His reputation, however, rests more particularly on the following three great works: "Cours de littérature française, tableau du XVIIIe siècle," "Tableau de l'éloquence chrétienne au IVe siècle," and, in a somewhat lesser degree, "Histoire de Gregoire VII.," this last-named being a posthumous publication (1873).

Villiers de L'Isle-Adam (vē-yā' dē lēl-ä-doṅ'), Philippe de. Born at Beauvais, France, in 1464: died in Malta in 1534. Grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. He was elected grand master in 1521. In 1522, after a six months' siege, he was compelled to surrender the island of Rhodes, the seat of the order, to Solyman. In 1530 he secured from Charles V. the cession of the islands of Malta and Gozo, which became the new seat of the order.

Villon (vē-yōṅ'), François. Born at Paris, 1431: died about 1484. One of the earliest French poets. Little is known of his life except what may be gathered from his own writings. Although of very humble extraction, he found means to acquire a good education. Beginning with his student days, he led throughout his whole life a wild Bohemian existence. Three times he appeared before the courts to answer serious charges (see the extract). The first time he was sentenced to be flogged. Between his first and second arrests he wrote "Le petit testament" (1456). For his second offense he was condemned to death; he owed his life, it is said, to one of the princesses of the royal household, to whom he had inscribed a poem, "Ecrit de la naissance Marie." She was presumably the daughter of the duke Charles d'Orléans, himself a poet, who raised Villon to an honorable position. In 1461 he again was imprisoned. On regaining his liberty he composed his masterpiece, "Le grand testament," in which Rabelais ascribes a large number of his older ballads. Besides these works already named, Villon wrote several separate poems and a series of obscure slang rimes, "Le jargon."

François Villon, or Corbueil, or Corbier, or de Montcorbier, or des Loges, was certainly born at Paris in the year 1431. Of the date of his death nothing certain is known, some authorities extending his life towards the close of the century in order to explain the Rabelais anecdotes of him, others supposing him to have died before the publication of the first edition of his works in 1489. That Villon was not his patronymic, whichsoever of his numerous aliases may really deserve that distinction, is certain. He was a citizen of Paris and a member of the university, having the status of clerc. But his youth was occupied in other matters than study. In 1455 he killed, apparently in self-defence, a priest named Philip Sermaise, died from Paris, was condemned to banishment in default of appearance, and six months afterwards received letters of pardon. In 1456 a faithless mistress, Catherine de Vaucel, drew him into a second affray, in which he had the worst, and again he fled from Paris. During his absence a burglary committed in the capital put the police on the track of a gang of young good-for-nothings among whom Villon's name figured, and he was arrested, tried, tortured, and condemned to death; on appeal, however, the sentence was commuted to banishment. Four years after he was in prison at Meung, consigned thither by the Bishop of Orléans; from this he escaped to the South, or, in plain fact, Thenceforward nothing certain is known of him.

Vinci (vin'chē), Leonardo (or Lionardo) da. Born at Vinci, near Empoli, Italy, 1452: died at Cloux, near Amboise, France, May 2, 1519. A famous Italian painter, architect, sculptor, scientist, engineer, mechanician, and musician. He was taken by his father to Verrocchio about 1470, with whom he remained until he was past twenty, drawing, modeling, designing for architecture, and planning engineering schemes. His studio companion was Lorenzo di Credi and Perugino. He was in the company of Lautrec in 1502, and received his first recorded commission in 1478. He seems to have gone to Milan about 1483, having prospered little at Florence. He returned to Florence in 1503; went to Milan again in 1506; and lived in Rome 1514–15. He painted his famous fresco, the Last Supper, on the wall of the refectory in the convent of Santa Maria della Grazie: it was finished in 1498. Owing to the dampness of the wall, it has been frequently repainted; the original sketches, however, still exist, and from a copy of it Giovanni d'Oggione Raphael Morghen produced his celebrated engraving published in 1800. While living in Milan under the protection of Ludovico il Moro, he occupied himself with the colossal equestrian statue of Duke Francesco I., the model of which was exhibited in 1493 and demolished by the French in 1499. On his return to Florence he drew the cartoon from which Filippino painted the altarpiece of the monks of Servi. His principal work subsequently seems to have been in portraiture, and he did many portraits of women: the best-known is the "Mona Lisa" in the Louvre, Paris, completed about 1504. He was also commissioned to paint a wall of the council-hall at Florence, for which he made a cartoon corresponding to the great cartoon of Michelangelo. Both are now lost. He went to France in 1516, at the invitation of Francis I., and died there at the Château de Cloux. Among his works are "La belle Ferronière," "The Virgin of the Rocks" (National Gallery, London, and another version at the Louvre), "St. John the Baptist" (Louvre), "Judith" (Louvre), and a cartoon of St. Anne in the Royal Academy, London. He wrote a celebrated treatise on painting, "Trattura della pittura," published in 1651. A portrait of him, by himself, is in the Royal Library, Turin.

He was employed in the restoration of many medieval buildings in France, including Notre Dame in Paris and the cathedrals of Amiens and Laon. His works include "Dictionnaire de l'architecture française du XIe au XVIe siècle" (10 vols., 1854–68), "Essai sur l'architecture militaire au moyen âge" (1854), "Dictionnaire du mobilier français" (1858), "Description de Notre-Dame de Paris" (1856), "Entretiens sur l'architecture" (1858), "Histoire d'une maison," "Histoire d'une forteresse," "Histoire de l'habitation humaine," "Histoire d'hôtel de ville et d'une cathédrale" (all 1875–76).

Vionville (vyōN-vēl'), or Mars-la-Tour (märs-lä-tör'). Battle of. A battle between the French and Germans, fought near the villages of Vionville and Mars-la-Tour, about 12 miles west of Metz, Aug. 16, 1870. The Germans (about 67,000) were commanded by Prince Frederick Charles; the French (120,000) by Marshal Bazaine. The result of the battle, which was one of the most fiercely contested and bloodiest of the century, was the preventing of the retreat of the French from Metz to Verdun. (See Metz.) The German loss in killed and wounded was about 16,000; the French loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was about 17,000. The third Westphalian infantry regiment lost 40 officers and 1,736 men — the heaviest regimental loss of the war.

Viper (vī'pėr), Doctor. A character in Foote's play "The Capuchin"; under this name he severely lashed an Irish clergyman named Jackson, in the pay of the Pretender of Kingston, as a revenge for the suppression of his play "The Trip to Calais" (which see).

Virginia. An asteroid (No. 50) discovered by Ferguson at Washington, Oct. 4, 1857.

Virginia. [Named from Queen Elizabeth, the "Virgin Queen."] One of the South Atlantic States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 36° 32′ to 39° 27′ N., and from long. 75° 13′ to 83° 37′ W. Capital, Richmond. It is bounded by West Virginia on the north and northwest, Maryland and the District of Columbia (separated by the Potomac) on the north and northeast, Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, North Carolina and Tennessee on the south, and Kentucky on the west, and contains a small detached portion east of Chesapeake Bay. It is called the "Old Dominion" and the "Mother of Presidents." It is level in the southeast and mountainous in the northwest and west, and is traversed from northeast to southwest by the Blue Ridge and other ranges of the Appalachians (highest peak, about 5,700 feet). It is sometimes divided into the physical regions Tidewater, Midland, Piedmont, Blue Ridge valley, and Appalachia. The principal rivers are those of the Potomac (with the Shenandoah), Rappahannock, York, James, Roanoke, and Tennessee. Virginia is rich in agricultural and mineral resources; is the second State in the Union in the production of tobacco, and has also a large production of wheat, corn, vegetables, fruit, timber, coal, iron, salt, and building-stone; has iron, coke, tobacco, leather, and other manufactures; and has various mineral springs and natural curiosities (as the Natural Bridge, Luray Caverns, etc.). It has 118 counties, sends 2 senators and 10 representatives to Congress, and has 12 electoral votes. It was the first of the original colonies, and one of the 13 original states, and was settled by the English at Jamestown in 1607. Its principal early settlers were Cavaliers, Huguenots, Somers, Gates, and Delaware. It was governed at first by the London Company. Negro slavery was introduced in 1619. It became a royal colony in 1624; was the scene of Bacon's rebellion in 1676; took part in the French and Indian war; took a prominent part in the events leading to the Revolution; ceded its territory beyond the Ohio; ratified the federal constitution in 1788; was the leading State in influence in the early history of the country, furnishing four of the first five Presidents; seceded from the Union April 17, 1861; became the center of the Confederate States, and contained their capital; and was one of the chief seats of the war. Among the events of which it was the scene were the battle of Bull Run, Peninsular and Valley campaigns, second Bull Run campaign, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville campaigns, Wilderness campaign, siege and capture of Petersburg, Richmond, and surrender of Lee's army. The State was readmitted to the Union in 1870. Area, 42,450 square miles. Population (1890), 1,655,980.

Virginia, Army of. A Federal army in the Civil War, formed in Aug., 1862, out of the commands of Fremont, Banks, and McDowell, commanded by General Pope, and took part in the second Bull Run campaign, after which it was discontinued.

Virginia City, or Virginia. The capital of Storey County, Nevada, situated on the slope of Mount Davidson, about 6,000 feet above sea-level, in lat. 39° 17′ N. It is the largest city in the state, and one of the richest mining centers in the world. It was built in 1859 over the Comstock Lode. Population (1890), 8,911.

Virginians (vėr-jin'i-anz), The. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1857–59. The scene is laid in Virginia in the 18th century. It is a sequel to "Henry Esmond."

Virginia Plan, The. An outline plan of a constitution for the United States, presented to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 by Edmund Randolph of Virginia. It projected a national union differing radically from the old confederacy.

Virginia Resolutions, The. Resolutions prepared by James Madison, and passed by the Virginia legislature Dec., 1798, which declared the Alien and Sedition acts "palpable and dangerous infractions of the Constitution."

Virgin (vėr'jin) Islands. A group of islands in the West Indies, east of Porto Rico. It comprises the British islands Tortola, Anegada, Virgin Gorda, etc. (forming part of the Leeward Islands Colony); the Spanish islands Culebra, Bieques, etc. (dependencies of Porto Rico); and the Danish islands St. Croix, St. Thomas, St. John, etc. They were discovered by Columbus in Nov., 1493. Total area, about 350 square miles. Population (1891), about 55,000.

Virginius. A tragedy by J. Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1820.

Virginius. An American vessel captured by the Spaniards in 1873 while engaged in filibustering. The captain and others were executed at Santiago de Cuba. The affair caused extreme tension between the American and Spanish governments. It ended in the payment of an indemnity by Spain.

Virgin Martyr, The. A tragedy by Massinger and Dekker, licensed in 1620, printed in 1621. It was revised in 1668 and 1716.

Virgin Queen. A name given to Queen Elizabeth of England.

Virgo (vėr'gō). [L., 'the virgin.'] An ancient constellation and sign of the zodiac. The figure represents a winged woman in a robe holding a spike of grain in her left hand. One of the stars was called Vindemiatrix, or by the Greeks Protrygeter — that is, precursor of the vintage. At the time when the zodiac seems to have been formed (2100 B. C.) this star would first be seen at Babylon before sunrise about Aug. 20, or, since there is some evidence that it was then brighter than it is now, perhaps a week earlier. This would seem too late for the vintage, so that perhaps this tradition is older than the zodiac. Virgo appears in the Egyptian zodiac without wings, yet there seems no room to doubt that the figure was first meant for the winged Assyrian Astarte, especially as the sixth month in Akkadian was called the "Errand of Ishtar." The symbol of the zodiacal sign is ♍, where a resemblance to a wing may be seen. The constellation contains the white first-magnitude star Spica.

Viriathus (vi-ri'a-thus), or Viriatus (vi-ri'a-tus). Assassinated about 139 B. C. A Lusitanian shepherd who conducted a long and generally successful war against the Romans in the western part of the Spanish peninsula 149–139.

Virues (vē-rō-es'), Cristóval de. Born at Valencia, Spain, about 1550; died about 1610. A Spanish epic and dramatic poet, a friend of Lope de Vega. Five of his plays are extant.

He claims to have first divided Spanish dramas into three jornadas or acts, and Lope de Vega assents to the claim; but they were both mistaken, for we now know that such a division was made by Francisco de Leyva not later than 1553, when Vega was but three years old. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 64.

Viscaino, Sebastian. See Vizcaino.

Vischer (fish'ėr), Friedrich Theodor. Born at Ludwigsburg, Würtemberg, June 30, 1807; died at Gmunden, Sept. 14, 1887. A German critic, professor at Tübingen. He was a member of the Frankfort Parliament in 1848. His chief work is "Ästhetik" (1847–58). His other works include "Über das Erhabene und Komische" (1837), "Kritische Gänge" (1844), etc.

Visconti (vis-kon'tē), Ennio Quirino. [From L. Vicecomites, viscount.] Born at Rome, Nov. 1, 1751; died Feb. 2, 1818. A celebrated Italian archæologist. He was conservator of the Capitoline Museum at Rome, and member of the provisional government at Rome. In 1797 he went to Paris, where in 1798 he was made custodian of the collections in the Louvre and professor of archæology. His chief work is "Iconographie grecque" (1808). His other works include the first volume of the "Iconographie romaine" (1817; completed by Mongez), "Museo Pio Clementino" (1782–87), "Description des antiques du musée royal," etc.

Visconti, Filippo Maria. Died 1447. The last Duke of Milan of the Visconti house, son of G. G. Visconti.

Visconti, Giangaleazzo. Died 1402. Grandnephew of Giovanni Visconti, and son of Galeazzo Visconti. He became duke of Milan in 1395; subdued a large part of northern and central Italy; and was a patron of literature and art.

Visconti, Giovanni. Died 1354. Lord of Milan. He annexed Genoa. His dominions were divided among his three nephews.

Visconti-Venosta (vis-kon'tē-vā-nōs'tä), Marquis Emilio. Born at Milan, Jan. 22, 1829. An Italian diplomatist and politician, minister of foreign affairs 1863–64, 1866–67, and 1869–76.

Vishnu (vish'nö). [Skt., 'the pervader'; from √vish, 'work, be active, accomplish.] In later Hindu mythology, the second member of the trimurti or triad (Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva): regarded as the preserver, while Brahma and Shiva are respectively the creator and the destroyer. Vishnu appears already in the Rigveda as a solar divinity. There his chief achievement is striding over the heavens in three steps, explained as designating the three daily stations of the sun in his rising, culmination, and setting, the conception out of which grew the legend of the Vamana, or dwarf incarnation of Vishnu. (See Vamana.) He is the companion of Indra in drinking the soma and in battling with Vritra. At times he appears as sent by Indra, and strengthened by him, while at others he rises into Indra strength, especially by preparing the soma for him. Not at first included among the Adityas, or sons of Aditi (whose number in the Vedic period varies from six to eight), when their number is raised to twelve, representing the sun in the twelve months of the year, Vishnu receives the first place among them. It is in the Mahabharata and the Ramayana that he appears without this solar character, and as gradually rising to his present supremacy as the most popular god of modern Hindu worship, while the Puranas represent the fully developed rivalry between Shiva and Vishnu and their worshipers, called respectively Shaivas and Vishnavas. The most marked feature of the modern Vishnu is his incarnation in a portion of his essence on ten different occasions to deliver mankind from special dangers. These ten principal avatars (“descents,” “incarnations”) are (1) the Matsya, or “fish”; (2) the Kurma, “tortoise”; (3) the Varaha, “boar”; (4) the Narasinha, “man-lion”; (5) the Vaamana, “dwarf”; (6) Parashurama, or “Rama with the ax”; (7) Ramachandra; (8) Krishna; (9) Buddha, by adopting whom the Brahmans apparently wished to effect a compromise between their own creed and Buddhism; and (10) Kalki, an incarnation, yet to come, in which Vishnu at the end of the four yugas or ages will destroy the wicked, and free the world from its enemies. See the articles. These various scenes of the Puranas increase to 22 or 24. As in their treatment of the triad the modern Hindus elevate either Shiva or Vishnu to the supremacy, subordinating the other two, Vishnu is often identified with Narayana, the personified Purusha, or primeval living spirit, and is described as moving on the waters, and resting on Shesha, the serpent of infinity, while Brahma emerges from a lotus growing from his navel. His wife is Lakshmi or Shri, and his paradise Vaikuntha. He has a peculiar mark on his breast called Shrivatsa, and has a conch-shell, a discus, a club, a bow, and a sword. Upon his wrist is the jewel Syamantaka, and on his breast the jewel Kaustubha. His vehicle is Garuda, who is half man, half bird (with the head, wings, talons, and beak of an eagle, and the body and limbs of a man), and whose face is white, wings red, and body golden. The Ganges issues from Vishnu’s foot. He has slain countless demons, a number of whom are specified in various legends. He has a thousand names, all given in the Anushasana-parvan (“Instruction-section”) of the Mahabharata, the third book of Siva, which numbers 3078. On Vishnu, see Muir’s “Original Sanskrit Texts,” IV. 63–208, and Monier-Williams’s “Brahmanism and Hinduism,” iii., v., and vi.

Vishnupurana (vish-nū-pū-rī′na). In Sanskrit literature, an important and typical Purana (see that word). It has been translated, with preface and many notes, by Wilson. A second edition of this translation has greatly enriched the first by further notes by Fitzedward Hall. It appears in Wilson’s works, Vol. VI (London, 1864). Wilson’s analysis of the Puranas in Vol. III, and his preface to Vishnupurana, are the chief sources of information on the Puranas.

Visigoths (viz′i-goths). [From LL. Visigothi, Visigothæ, West Goths.] The individuals of the more westerly of the two great historical divisions of the Goths. See Goths. The Visigoths founded a kingdom chiefly which continued in southern France until 507, and in Spain until 711. Also called West Goths.

Vision of Don Roderick. A narrative poem by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1811.

Vision of Judgment. 1. A poem by Southey, published in 1821.—2. A burlesque of this poem by Lord Byron.

Vision of Ezekiel (e-zē′ki-el), The. God the Father, with the symbols of the four Evangelists: a small but impressive painting by Raphael, in the Galleria Pitti, Florence. The God-head is treated perhaps too much like a Jupiter, but the grouping is admirable.

Vision of Mirza (mēr′zä). The. An allegory by Addison, published in the “Spectator,” No. 159. It is a work of human life.

Vision of Piers Plowman (pērs plou′man). An allegorical and satirical poem by William Langland, begun about 1362, revised in 1377, and revised and enlarged until about 1393. It was very popular, as attested by its numerous MSS., and was printed in 1550, 1561, 1563, in several editions. There have been several modern reprints, the most recent of which is that edited by Professor W. W. Skeat in 1887. This incorporates the conditions of three MS. texts, of different dates, with notes. The book is really the “Vision of William concerning Piers Plowman,” who is the subject, not the author. There are other visions incorporated, but this was the favorite division of Langland.

In the earlier part of the poem he is a blameless ploughman and a guide to men who are seeking the shrine of Truth, whilst in the latter part of it he is the blameless carpenter’s son who shows us the Father. The ambiguity is surely not very great, and the reader who once apprehends this explanation will easily remember that the true Piers Plowman was certainly not a Middle-English author.

Skeat, Preface to Piers the Plowman, p. xxvii.

Vision of Sir Launfal (län′fal). A poem by James Russell Lowell, published in 1848.

Viso, Monte. See Monte Viso.

Vistula (vis′tū-lä). [F. Vistule, L. Vistula, G. Weichsel, Pol. Wisła.] A large river of northern Europe. It rises in Austrian Silesia in the Jablunka Mountains, forms part of the boundary between Austrian Silesia and Galicia on the one side and Prussian Silesia on the other; passes through Galicia, and forms part of the boundary between Galicia and Poland; traverses Poland; enters Prussia; separates near its mouth into the Vistula and Nogat; and then divides into the Danziger Vistula and the Elbinger Vistula, of which the former flows directly into the Gulf of Dantzic and the latter into the Frisches Haff. Its chief tributaries are the San, Pilica, Bug, and Brahe; the chief towns on its banks, Cracow, Warsaw, Plock, Thorn, and Dantzic. Length, about 650 miles; navigable for small vessels from Cracow, for large vessels from the mouth of the San.

The origin of the name of this river [Vistula (Germ. Weichsel, Vixel, Slav. Visla, Lat. Vistula) unfortunately can hardly be ascertained with certainty. It is sometimes regarded as originally and thoroughly Teutonic, sometimes as Slavonic, sometimes also as Slavo-Teutonic (Mullenhoff, ii. 307; J. v. Fierlinger, K. Z., xxvii. 479). The last seems to be the most probable.

Vistula Governments. The official name of Russian Poland.

Visurgis (vi-sėr′jis). The Latin name of the Weser.

Vitalians (vi-tā′li-anz). A band of pirates who infested the Baltic and North seas at the end of the 14th and the beginning of the 15th century.

Vitalis (vē-tä′lēs). Pseudonym of the Swedish poet Sjöberg.

Vitalis (vī-tā′lis). See Ordericus.

Vita Nuova (vē′tä nwō′vä). [It., ‘The New Life.’] A work by Dante, probably finished in 1307.

Dante wrote in his early manhood the “Vita Nuova”—the New or the Early Life—connecting, with a narrative of aspiration towards Beatrice as the occasion of them, sonnets and canzoni, representing artificially, according to the manner of that time, various moods of love.

Morley, English Writers, III. 402.

Vitebsk (vē-tebsk′). 1. A government of western Russia, surrounded by the governments of Livonia, Pskoff, Smolensk, Moghileff, Minsk, Vilna, and Courland. Area, 17,440 square miles. Population, 1,341,100.—2. The capital of the government of Vitebsk, situated on the Düna in lat. 55° 15′ N. It has considerable trade. Population (1888), 59,425.

Vitellius (vi-tel′i-us), Aulus. Born 15 A. D.; killed at Rome, Dec., 69 A. D. Roman emperor, a favorite of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. He was appointed governor in Lower Germany by Galba in 68, and was proclaimed emperor by the army at the beginning of 69. His generals Cæcina and Valens defeated Otho, and he entered Rome in the middle of 69. His forces were defeated by those of Vespasian under Antonius Primus.

Viterbo (vē-ter′bō). [ML. Viterbium, Biterum.] A city of the province of Rome, Italy, 41 miles north-northwest of Rome. It has a noted cathedral, and was formerly a papal residence. In the neighborhood are mineral springs and Etruscan antiquities. Population (1881), 19,654.

Viti (vē′tē), or Maviti (mä-vē′tē), also called Mazitu (mä-zē′tō). A tribe of marauders in East Africa, originally Zulus from the neighborhood of Sofala and Inhambane, who, about 1850, crossed the Zambesi and ravaged the region between the Rovuma and Rufiji rivers. Many settled finally southwest of Lake Nyassa, where they are called Mangoni (Livingstone, 1869). Others mixed with different tribes, especially with the Mahenge. Taking advantage of the fear inspired by the Maviti, other marauders, as the Waninde and the Wangindo, took their name, costume, and manners in order to facilitate their depredations.

Viti Archipelago. See Fiji Islands.

Vitiges (vi-tī-jēz). An East-Gothic king who reigned from 536 to about 540. He was taken captive to Constantinople by Belisarius.

Viti Levu (vē′tē lev′ō). The largest island of the Fiji group, and the most important in respect to population and fertility. Length, about 80 miles. Width, about 55 miles.

Vitim (vē-tēm′). A river in Siberia which rises in Transbaikalia and joins the Lena about lat. 59° 50′ N. Length, about 1,400 miles.

Vitoria, or Vittoria (vē-tō′rē-ä). [ML. Victoriacum, Victoria.] The capital of the Basque province of Alava, Spain, situated on the Zadorra in lat. 42° 50′ N., long. 2° 53′ W. It is an important commercial and manufacturing town. A victory was gained there by the Allies under Wellington over the French under Joseph Bonaparte and Jourdan, June 21, 1813. Population (1887), 37,660.

Vitoria, Duke of. A title of Espartero.

Vitré (vē-trā′). A town in the department of Ille-et-Vilaine, France, situated on the Vilaine 24 miles east of Rennes. It contains a castle, and a church of Notre Dame, and is noted for its old Breton aspect. Population (1891), 10,607.

Vitruvius Pollio (vi-trō′vi-us pol′i-ō), Marcus: called Vitruvius. Born at Verona. A famous Roman architect and engineer, military engineer under Cæsar and Augustus. His treatise on architecture, in ten books (“De architectura”), dedicated to Augustus, is the only surviving Roman treatise on the subject. He seems to have been an unsuccessful architect: his book, however, was well known to Pliny, and on it was based almost all the earlier theory and practice of Renaissance and pseudo-classical architecture.

Vitry-le-François (vē-trē′lē-fron-swä′). [See def.] A town in the department of Marne, France, situated on the Marne 20 miles southeast of Châlons-sur-Marne. It was founded by Francis I. Population (1891), commune, 8,022.

Vittoria Coronmbona. See White Devil.

Vittorio (vit-to′re-o). A town in the province of Treviso, Italy, situated on the Meschio 38 miles north of Venice. It is composed of the two former towns Ceneda and Serravalle. Ceneda was an important place in the middle ages. It has silk-mills and manufactures of cotton and wool. Population (1881), 16,683.

Vitus (vī′tus), Saint. A saint of the Roman church, a martyr under Diocletian. His festival is celebrated June 15. At Ulm and Ravensburg and other places in Germany it was believed in the 17th century that good health could be secured for a year by dancing before his image at his festival, and bringing gifts: hence it is said that St. Vitus’s dance came to be confounded with chorea, a nervous disorder, and he was invoked against it.

Vitznau (vits′nou). A small village in the canton of Lucerne, Switzerland, situated on the Lake of Lucerne 9 miles east-southeast of Lucerne. It is a tourist center.

Vivarais (vē-vä-rī′), [L. pagus Vivariensis.] An ancient district in Languedoc, France, corresponding nearly to the modern department of Ardèche. Capital, Viviers.

Vivian (viv′i-an), or Viviane, or Vivien. In the Arthurian cycle of romance, an enchantress, the mistress of Merlin. She brought up Lancelot in her palace, which is described situated in a magical lake: hence her name “the lady of the Lake.” Tennyson has used the subject of her subjugation of Merlin in his “Merlin and Vivien” in the “Idylls of the King.”

At length this renowned magician [Merlin] disappeared entirely from England. His voice alone was heard in a forest, where he was enclosed in a bush of hawthorn: he had been entrapped in this awkward residence by means of a charm he had communicated to the lady Vivian or Viviane, who, not believing in the spell, had tried it on her lover. The lady was sorry for the accident, but there was no extracting her admirer from his thorny covert.

Southey, Hist. of Brazil, Preface, I. lxii.

It . . . seems evident that it is to the Hwimleian, or Chwilerian of Merlinus Silvestris (the historical Merlin of Scotland), that we are to attribute the origin of Viviane of the romances of Chivalry, and who now so conspicuous a part in those compositions, although it is true that there is not much resemblance betwixt the two names. But if we look into the poems of Merlin Sylvestris, we shall find that the female personage of whom he chiefly sings, the French romances might easily be modified into Viviane, is repeatedly referred to by the bard in his vaticinations. It also seems probable, as the Hwilleian signifies a tempest, to appears and disappears, and also as the word bears some resemblance in sound to Sibylla, that the bard, by a confusion of terms and ideas not unfrequent in early writers, coined this name as an appellation for some imaginary character, and thus furnished the original of Viviane.

T. Price, Literary Remains, I. 144.

Vivian Grey. A novel by Disraeli, published in 1826.

Viviani (vē-vē-ä′nē), Vincenzo. Born at Florence, April 5, 1622; died Sept. 22, 1703. An Italian mathematician, a pupil of Galileo, and his companion during the last years of the great astronomer’s life. His theoretical restoration of the lost books of Aristæus and of Apollonius of Perga on conic sections was verified by the discovery of the text.

Vivien de Saint-Martin (vē-vi-en′ de saṅ-mar-tan′), Louis. Born at Caen, May 22, 1802. A noted French geographer, one of the founders of the Geographical Society of Paris. He founded in 1859 the “Athenæum français,” and edited “L’Annee géographique” 1863–76. He has also written “Etude sur la géographie grecque et latine de l’Inde” (1858–60), “Le nord d’Afrique dans l’antiquité grecque et romaine” (1863), “Nouveau dictionnaire de géographie universelle” (1877–1894), etc.

Viviers (vē-vyā′). [ML. Vivarias, Vivarium.] A small town in the department of Ardèche, France, situated on the Rhone southeast of Privas.

Vivitao (vē-vē-tä′ō), or Vavitau. One of the principal islands of the Austral group, Pacific Ocean.

Population, 1,456,000. 2. The capital of the government of Vladimir, situated on the Klyasma 110 miles east by north of Moscow. It contains two ancient cathedrals. That of the Assumption was rebuilt in the 13th century after destruction by the Tatars, and, though twice since restored, preserves much of its old character and interest. It was until the middle of the 15th century the metropolitan church of Russia. It possesses rich silver shrines, tombs of princes and metropolitans, and many other historical relics. That of Dimitri of Solun is remarkable for the abundant sculpture, representing animals, birds, foliage, and the like, which adorns the walls of white sandstone. The great portal is one of the finest of its type: the archivolt is profusely carved with foliage and arabesques of grotesque animals and cable moldings. The date of the church is 1194: it was recently restored under Nicholas I. The style approaches the pure Byzantine, with marks of Oriental influences, and in this phase is better exhibited here than in any other existing building. From the middle of the 12th century to 1328 Vladimir was the residence of the Russian grand princes. Population (1885–1889), 39,709.

Its central hero is Sigurd the Volsung, the Siegfried of the "Nibelungenlied." Unlike the German version, the story has throughout a heathen character, and the gods in person enter into its action. It was probably written in Norway not long after the middle of the 13th century. Its material was taken in part from ancient popular legends, partly from old heroic poems, some of which are preserved in the Elder Edda. It, and not the "Nibelungenlied," is the principal source of Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelungs."

Volta (vol'tä). A small town in Italy, 15 miles north-northwest of Mantua. On July 26–27, 1848, the Austrians drove back the Sardinians.

Volta, Count Alessandro. Born at Como, Italy, Feb. 18, 1745: died there, March 5, 1827. A celebrated Italian physicist, famous for his researches and inventions in electricity: professor in Como and Pavia. He was made by Napoleon senator of Lombardy, and invented the electrophorus, electroscope, condenser, and the voltaic pile (described, and named from him).

Voltaire (vol-tär') : the assumed name of François Marie Arouet (ä-rō-ā'). Born at Châtenay, Feb. 20, 1694: died at Paris, May 30, 1778. A famous French writer. He took the name of Voltaire, the origin of which is still in dispute, in 1718, a short time after the performance of his tragedy "Œdipe." His father, a notary connected with the Parliament of Châtelet, was a man of some wealth. Young Arouet was one of the most brilliant pupils of the Collège Louis-le-Grand (then in the hands of the Jesuits). Before he was out of college he began writing poetry. He was, as will be the influence of his godfather, the Abbé de Châteauneuf, secured for him an introduction into the most aristocratic circles of Parisian society. But his freedom of utterances soon brought him into trouble. Between 1716 and 1726 he was twice exiled from Paris, and twice thrown a prisoner into the Bastille, both for things that had been written by him and on mere suspicion, and always without a trial. His last imprisonment was due to his resenting an insult offered him by a dissolute young nobleman, the Chevalier de Rohan. He was soon liberated, however, and at once went to England, where he remained over two years (1726–29). Already a celebrated dramatic writer, owing to the success of Œdipe, he published in this country the publication of his epic poem on Henry the Fourth, "La Henriade," the first complete edition of which was dedicated to the Queen of England. He returned to France in 1729, and won repeated successes both as a poet and a historian. In 1734 he took up his residence with the Marquise du Châtelet in the Château of Cirey in Champagne, where he resided most of the time until that lady's death in 1749. It was during this period of his life that he became historiographer of France and "a gentleman of the king's bedchamber." He also had some intercourse with Prote

Benedict XIV., to whom he dedicated his tragedy "Mahomet." Madame du Chatelet's death he returned to Paris, but soon left France for Prussia, where Frederick the Great, who had always admired him, had often requested him to take up his residence. There he remained from July, 1750, to March, 1753. Voltaire and Frederick, who had met almost as lovers, parted bitter enemies, and the great writer was arrested on his way through Frankfort, at the request of the king's representative, although not guilty, nor even accused, of offense, and was treated with harshness. During his stay in Berlin and Potsdam he had completed and published one of his most important works, "Le siecle de Louis XIV." His return to France was followed by a period of wandering caused by the refusal of the arbitrary government of Louis XV. to allow him to come to Paris. He finally settled at Ferney, (1756) where for two years later he moved to Ferney, a large estate only a few miles distant, which he purchased, and where he spent the remainder of his life (1758–75). Much of his time was given to the defense and protection of the victims of religious intolerance and fanaticism. He thus spent about two years getting justice done to the family and memory of a Protestant, Jean Calas, who had been put to death upon a false accusation of killing one of his sons to prevent his turning Catholic. He was constantly at work, also, revising his formerly published writings, issuing numerous pamphlets, both in prose and verse, in favor of freedom of thought, and carrying on an extensive correspondence. Early in 1778, during the reign of Louis XVI., at the request of his friends he determined to visit Paris, where he was received with great enthusiasm. The fatigue of the journey and the excitement of his reception proved too much for his weakened frame, and he died at Paris, May 30, 1778. His most important works are: tragedies, "Œdipe." "Brutus," "Zaire" (considered the best), "Mérope," "Mahomet," "Alzire," "Tancrède"; poems, "La Henriade," "Epitre à Uranie," "La mort d'Adrienne Lecouvreur." "Discours sur l'homme," "La loi naturelle," "Le desastre de Lisbonne," "Le mondain," and the one which his admirers would prefer he had never written, "La Pucelle"; history, "Histoire de Charles XII.," "Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations," "Le siècle de Louis XIV.," "Histoire de Russie sous Pierre le Grande"; philosophy, "Dictionnaire philosophique"; literary criticism, "Commentaire sur Corneille"; fiction, "Candide," "La princesse de Babylone," "L'Ingenu," "L'Homme aux quarante écus," "Zadig"; miscellanies (which fill a very large number of volumes), "Lettres philosophiques," "Traite de la tolérance." His correspondence is considered as high in merit of Madame de Sévigné. The best of his works are the Edition de Kehl (Kehl, 1784 et seq., 72 vols.), Beuchot's edition (Paris, 1829 et seq., 72 vols.), and Iceland's edition (Paris, Garnier, 1877 et seq., 52 vols.). A selection of his works is in course of publication (1894): it is edited by Georges Bengesco, who is also the author of a bibliography of Voltaire's works, in 4 volumes.

Volterra (vol-ter'rä). A town in the province of Pisa, Italy, 35 miles southwest of Florence: the ancient Volaterræ. It contains a cathedral, a stately Romanesque structure, in the Pisan arcaded style, consecrated in 1493, and erected about a century later. The marble pulpit bears 12th-century scriptural reliefs, and rests on four granite columns, two of them with lions. There are some fine tombs, paintings by several pupils of the great masters, particularly a superb "Annunciation" by Signorelli. The Porta all' Arco is one of the original gates of the old Etruscan city. It is arched, and is flanked by 8 and 12 wide, the outer arch formed of 19 enormous blocks of travertine assembled without cement, and bearing three curious heads in relief on the keystone and imposts. The gate passage, 30 feet long, with grooves for portcullis, is Roman.

Vondel (von'del), Joost van den. Born at Cologne, Nov. 17, 1587: died at Amsterdam in 1679. A Dutch dramatist and poet: the greatest name in Dutch literature. His parents, who had fled to Cologne from Antwerp, removed to Amsterdam in 1597. After his father's death in 1606 he married, and kept the stocking-shop in which he had succeeded his father. This business was successfully continued long after he had acquired a literary reputation, but in 1657 his unsuccessful management of it by his widow led to bankruptcy. His own small fortune was sacrificed, and he was forced to accept a clerkship where from his seventieth to his eighticth year he labored for a pittance. In 1668, after he had been obliged to resign his position on account of the weakness of old age, he finally received a small state pension. His literary career was begun with the drama "Het Pascha" ("The Pascha"), produced in 1612 before the "Rhetorical Chamber," of which he was a member (the so-called Flemish Chamber of the Leven der Fluyt). In 1619, after the performance of the first of his biblical dramas, the tragedy "Hierusalem verwoest" ("Jerusalem Destroyed"), he went over to the Chamber of the Eglantine. His subsequent works are the tragedy "Palamedes," and "Amsterdamsche Heeta" ("The Amsterdam Hecuba": a free version of Seneca), both 1625; the tragedy (the greatest of his dramas) "Gysbrecht van Aemstel," 1637; "Maeghden" ("St. Ursula") and "Gebroeders" ("Brothers," i. e., the sons of Saul), both 1639; "Joseph in Dothan" and "Joseph in Egypten," both 1640; "Peter en Pauwels" ("Peter and Paul"), 1641; "Maria Stuart," 1646; "De Leeuwendalers" (a pastoral play in celebration of the peace of Westphalia) and "Salomon" ("Solomon"), both 1648; the choral drama "Lucifer," 1654; "Salmoneus," 1657; "Jephtha," 1659; "Koning David in ballingschap" ("King David in Exile"), "Koning David herstelt" ("King David Restored"), and "Samuel," all 1660; "Adonias" ("Adonijah"), 1661; "Batavische Broeders," 1662; "Faeton" ("Phaethon"), 1663; "Adam in ballingschap" ("Adam in Exile"), 1664; "Zungchin," 1666; and "Noah," 1667. He also made many other translations from the classics (among them Vergil's "Eneid," 1660, and Ovid's "Metamorphoses," 1661), and of versions of classical originals from Seneca, Sophocles, Euripides, from Sophocles, the "Electra," 1668, "Œdipus Tyrannus" ("Œdipus Tyrannus"), 1660, and "Hercules," 1663, from Euripides, "Ifigenie in Taurien" ("Iphigenia in Tauris"), 1666, and "Herclaasche Spelen" ("The Herculanician Iphigenia"), 1668). His literary works reflect clearly his own political and religious views. He was at the outset a supporter of the House of Orange, as is plainly visible in the "Pascha," from 1612. The action of the Synod of Dort, and the progress of Calvinism, brought about a revulsion of feeling, which appears in the antithesis of "Murdered Innocence," from 1625, represented under this disguise the trial of Olden-Barnevelt, and cost the poet a summons before the court at Amsterdam, and a fine of 300 florins. In 1650 he wrote the popular verse against the Calvinistic zealots. In 1641 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and subsequently wrote in praise of it. In addition to the above he has among others, the didactic poems "Altaergeheimenissen" ("Mysteries of the Altar"), 1645; "Johannes de boetgezant" ("John the Evangelist"), 1662; "De Heerlijkheid der kerke" ("The Glory of the Church"), 1663; and the tragedy of "Maria Stuart," already mentioned. The dramatic poem "Lucifer," the greatest of his works, is considered by many Dutch critics to be an allegorical account of the rise of the Netherlands against Philip of Spain. He has been called "the Dutch Shakspere." His collected works, together with a Life of the poet, were published at Amsterdam, 1850–69, in 12 vols.

Vortigern (vör'ti-gėrn). A British king, of the middle of the 5th century, who is said to have invited the Jutes to Britain to aid the Britons against the Picts.

Vos (vōs). Martin de. Born at Antwerp: died about 1604. A Flemish painter.

Vosges (vōzh), G. Vogesen (fō'ges-en). [L. Vosegus or Vogesus.] A range of mountains in eastern France and western Germany, which forms in part the boundary between them. It extends from basel northward, parallel with the Rhine, and, including its continuation the Hardt, through Rhenish Bavaria, and is connected westward by the Monts Faucilles with the plateau of Langres. Highest point, the Ballon de Guebwiller (about 4,680 feet).

Vosges. A department of France, bounded by Meuse, Meurthe-et-Moselle, Alsace-Lorraine, Haute-Saône, and Haute-Marne. Capital, Epinal. It is traversed by the Vosges Mountains in the east and by the Monts Faucilles in the south. It has important forests, and manufactures of iron, cotton, etc. It was formed chiefly from part of Lorraine. Area, 2,266 square miles. Population (1891), 410,196.

Voss (fos), Johann Heinrich. Born at Sommerlpof, Mecklenburg, Feb. 29, 1751: died at Heidelberg, March 29, 1826. A German poet. He studied first theology and then philology at Gottingen, where he was one of the founders of the poetic brotherhood, the so-called Hainbund. In 1778 he was appointed rector of the school at Otterndorf, which position he exchanged in 1782 for one at Eutin. On account of ill health he afterward gave this up, and in 1802 went to Jena, and in 1805 to Heidelberg, where he lived until his death. His principal original work is the idyl "Luise," published first in 1784 (in its complete form in 1795). His fame is based principally upon his translations of the classical writers, particularly of Homer: the Odyssey appeared in 1781; the Iliad, together with a revised version of the Odyssey also translated, in 1793; Vergil in 1799, Horace and Hesiod in 1806, Theocritus and Bion and Moschus in 1808, Tibullus in 1810, and Aristophanes in 1821. He is also the author of a number of lyrical poems. His complete poetical works ("Sämmtliche poetische Werke") were published at Leipsic in 1835.

Vossius (vosh'i-us). Gerardus Johannes, Latinized from Vos (fōs) or Voss (fos). Born near Heidelberg, 1577: died at Amsterdam, March 17, 1649. A Dutch classical scholar, grammarian, and Protestant theologian: professor successively at Dort, Leyden, and Amsterdam. His works include "Grammatica Latina" (1607), "Etymologicum linguæ Latinæ" (1662), "Commentariorum rhetoricorum libri vi." (1606), "De historicis Græcis" (1624), "De historicis Latinis" (1627), "De theologia gentili" (1642), "Historiæ Pelagianæ" (1618).

Votan (vō-tän'). A hero-god of Indians of the Maya stock in southern Mexico and Guatemala. He is described in the "Book of Votan," an ancient work in the Tzendal language of Chiapas: this has come down to us in a transcript in Roman text. Votan was descended from Chan, the serpent. He came from over the sea, introduced civilization into Mexico, founded Palenque, and founded the "empire" of Xibalba, supposed by some to be Palenque. Then he disappeared, and was worshiped as a god. Votan was perhaps a generic name for several chiefs. Some authors suppose that the original Votan came from Cuba about 600 (?) or 955 (?) B. C.

Voulon (vō-lōn'). A village in the department of Vienne, France, south of Poitiers. Here (not at Vouillé), in 507, the Franks under Clovis defeated the West Goths under Alaric II.

Voyage autour de ma Chambre. ['Journey around my Room.'] A novel by Xavier de Maistre, published in 1794.

The "Voyage autour de ma Chambre" (of De Maistre) (readers may be informed or reminded) is a whimsical description of the author's meditations and experiences when confined to barracks for some military peccadillo. After a fashion, which has found endless imitators since, the prisoner contemplates the various objects of his room, spins little romances to himself about them and about his beloved Madame de Hautetour, moralises on the faithfulness of his servant Annette, and so forth. The "Expédition Nocturne," a less popular sequel, is not very different in plan. Saintsbury, French Novelists, p. 144.

Voyages de Cyrus, Les. A work by the Chevalier Ramsay, the friend of Fénelon and tutor to the sons of the Pretender, first published in 1727. It was translated into English in 1730.

Voyer d'Argenson. See Argenson.

Vryburg (vri'berg). The capital of British Bechuanaland, South Africa.

Vulcan (vul'kan). 1. In Roman mythology, the god of fire and the working of metals, and the patron of all handicraftsmen. Originally an independent deity, he became, with the advance of time, completely identified with the Greek Hephæstus. He was the son of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, and was born with deformed feet, though according to late myths his lameness came from his having been hurled down from heaven by Jupiter in a fit of anger. He was the divine artist, the creator of all that was beautiful as well as of all that was technically wonderful in the abodes of the gods. On earth various volcanoes, as Lemnos and Etna, were held to be his workshops, and the Cyclopes were his journeymen. He had the power of conferring life upon his creations, and was thus the author of Pandora, and of the golden dogs of Alcinous. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one-sleeved tunic of the workman, with a conical cap, holding hammer and tongs or other attributes of the smith, and sometimes with indication of his lameness. When Jupiter conceived Minerva in his head, the goddess was delivered full-armed upon the stroke of an ax in the hands of Vulcan.

2. A hypothetical planet between the sun and the planet Mercury. An object supposed to be a planet was seen crossing the sun's disk on March 26, 1859. The period of revolution assigned to it was something over 19 days, and its distance from the sun was estimated at about 13,000,000 miles. The existence of Vulcan, however, has not been confirmed (may, indeed, be said to have been practically disproved) by subsequent careful observations.

Vulcanalia (vul-ka-nā'li-ą). An ancient Roman festival in honor of Vulcan, celebrated on Aug. 23 with games in the Flaminian circus, near the temple of the god, and with sacrifices of fishes. As part of the observance on this day, work was begun by lamp-light in honor of the fire-god.

Vulcan Pass. A pass in the Carpathians, between Transylvania and Rumania, about lat. 45° 25′ N., long. 23° 17′ E.

Vulgar Errors. See Pseudodoxia Epidemica.

Vulgate (vul'gāt). [ML. Vulgata, sc. editio or versio, 'the published' (i. e. 'commonly circulated') 'edition' or 'version.'] The Latin version of the Scriptures accepted as the authorized version of the Roman Catholic Church. It was prepared by Jerome about the close of the 4th century, partly by translation from the original, partly by revision of prior Latin versions. It gradually came into general use between the 6th and the 9th century. The Anglo-Saxon translations were made from it, and also Wyclif's English version, while other English versions from Tyndale's onward have been much influenced by it. The Vulgate was the first book printed (about 1455). The Council of Trent ordered that the "old and vulgate edition, "approved by the "usage of so many ages," should be the only Latin version used in "public lectures, disputations, sermons, and expositions." Authorized editions were afterward published under Sixtus V. in 1590 and Clement VIII. in 1592-95. The latter, or Clementine edition, is at present the accepted standard of the Roman Catholic Church, and is the basis of the Douay Bible. The religious terminology of the languages of western Europe has been in great part derived from or influenced by the Vulgate.

This Vulgate or received version (the word vulgate means 'currently received'), as it actually existed in the Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation, was not the pure text of Jerome, but was Jerome's version considerably modified by things which had been carried over from the older Latin translations taken from the Greek.

Waal (wäl). The southern arm of the Rhine, in Gelderland and South Holland, Netherlands. It separates from the other branch about 10 miles southeast of Arnhem, taking about two thirds of the entire stream; and unites with the Meuse and flows on as the Merwede and Old Meuse.

Wabash (wâ'bash). The capital of Wabash County, Indiana, situated on the Wabash 75 miles north-northeast of Indianapolis. Population (1890), 5,105.

Wabash. A river which rises in Mercer County, Ohio, flows west and southwest through Indiana, forms part of the boundary between Indiana and Illinois, and joins the Ohio at the intersection of Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky. Its chief tributary is the White River. On its banks are Logansport, Lafayette, Terre Haute, and Vincennes. Length, about 500 miles.

Wace (wäs), or Eustace, erroneously called Robert. Born in the island of Jersey about 1124: died about 1174. An Anglo-Norman poet. He received a prebend at Bayeux under Henry II., and was attached to the Anglo-Norman court. He wrote two poetical romances: "Roman de Brut," and "Roman de Rou," or "Romance of Rollo," which was a poetical version of the story of the Norman conquest by William of Poitiers, chaplain to William the Conqueror. Wace made some additions, including a third part. See Brut and Roman de Brut.

Wacht am Rhein (vächt äm rin), Die. ['The Watch on the Rhine."] A German popular song, words by Schneckenburger (1840), music by Karl Wilhelm (1854). It enjoyed great vogue in the war of 1870-71, becoming a national song. Other composers also wrote music for it.

Wacht der deutschen Vaterland (vächt der doich'en fä'ter-länd), Die. ["The Watch of the German Fatherland."] A German national hymn by Reichardt, first performed Aug. 2, 1825. It was constantly sung during the war of 1870-71.

Wachtel (väch'tel), Theodor. Born at Hamburg, March 10, 1823: died at Berlin, Nov., 1893. A German tenor singer. He was a groom and driver for his father, who kept a livery-stable. He first sang in England in 1862, came to the United States in 1871 and 1875. He was noted for his high C, which he sang as a chest note, and not in falsetto.

Wackles (wak'lz), Mrs. and the Misses. Characters in Dickens's novel "The Old Curiosity Shop."

Waco (wā'kō). The capital of McLennan County, Texas, situated on the Brazos 93 miles northnortheast of Austin. It has varied manufactures. Population (1890), 14,445.

Wadai (wä-dī'). A Mohammedan kingdom of the eastern Sudan, Africa, between lat. 8° 20′ and 18° 20′ N., bordering on Kanem and Baghirmi in the west, on Tibbuland in the north, on Darfur in the east, and on Dar Runga (its tributary) in the south. The country is generally an arid sandy plain, where the camel and the ostrich thrive: only in the southern part are forests. It is called tolerably fertile. The population, numbering 2,000,000–4,000,000, is mixed. The Arabs and Fulahs, though numerous, are not dominant. The kingdom belongs to the negro tribe of Maba, which, under Abd-el-Kerim, introduced Islam about 1635. Life and property were unsafe until Sultan Ali established some order (since 1889). The chief exports are ivory, feathers, and slaves which go to Bengazi or Egypt. See Maba.

Wadan (wä-dän'). The chief town of Adrar, in the western part of the Sahara.

Waddington (wod'ing-tọn; F. pron. vä-dan-tọn'), William Henry. Born at St.-Remi, Eure-et-Loire, France, Dec. 11, 1826: died Jan. 13, 1894. A French statesman and archæologist. He entered the National Assembly in 1871, and the Senate in 1876; was minister of public instruction in 1873 and 1876-77; was minister of foreign affairs 1877-79; and was French plenipotentiary at the Congress of Berlin 1878, premier Feb.-Dec., 1879, and ambassador to Great Britain 1883-89. He wrote memoirs of an archeological journey to Asia Minor, "Mélanges de numismatique et de philologie" (1861), "Voyage archeologique en Grece et en Asie Mineure" (1868–77).

Wade (wād), Benjamin Franklin. Born near Springfield, Mass., Oct. 27, 1800: died at Jefferson, Ohio, March 2, 1878. An American lawyer and statesman. He was Whig and later Republican United States senator from Ohio 1851–69; was an anti-slavery leader; opposed the Fugitive-Slave Bill, Nebraska Bill, etc.; and favored the Homestead Bill. He opposed the war, and emancipation. He was acting Vice-President under Johnson, and commissioner to Santo Domingo in 1871.

Wadelai (wä-de-lī'). A town in equatorial Africa, on the Nile north of Albert Nyanza. It was a main station of Emin Pasha.

Wadham (wod'am) College. A college of Oxford University, founded in 1612 by Nicholas Wadham. The chapel, despite its date, is built in the Perpendicular style; it possesses good glass. The gatetower and the framed wooden ceiling of the hall are also noteworthy.

Wadidikimo (wä-dē-dē-kē'mō). See Pygmies.

Wadman (wod'man), Widow. A character in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." She has a tender feeling for Uncle Toby, and the scene where among other encouragements she approaches her face nearer and nearer to his, that he may extract a supposititous something from her eye, is often referred to.

Wadsworth (wodz'wėrth), James Samuel. Born at Geneseo, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1807: died near Chancellorsville, Va., May 8, 1864. An American general. He was a member of the peace conference in 1861; served in the first battle of Bull Run in 1861; was made brigadier-general in 1861; became military governor of Washington in 1862; was distinguished as a division commander at Fredericksburg and Gettysburg; was sent on a tour of special service in the South and West in 1863; and was mortally wounded at the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864.

Wady-Halfa (wā'dē-hāl'fā). A locality at the second cataract of the Nile, often regarded as the southern limit of Egypt. It contains important inscriptions.

Waesland (wās'länt). A well-cultivated district in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, lying north and west of the Schelde and northeast of Ghent.

Wafer (wā'fėr), Lionel. Born in Wales (?) about 1640: died at London after 1700. A British surgeon and traveler. After making several voyages to the East Indies, he settled in Jamaica, and in 1677 joined the buccaneers. He was with Dampier on the Isthmus of Panama in 1680, and on account of a quarrel was left among the Indians, living with them until 1684. In 1688–90 he was in North America. He published "A New Voyage and Description of the Isthmus of America" (1699; French, German, and Swedish translations). It is the first good English description of the Isthmus, and is important in connection with the history of the buccaneers.

Waghäusel (väg'hoi-zel). A village in Baden, in the neighborhood of Karlsruhe. Here, June 21, 1849, the Prussians defeated the Baden insurgents.

Wagner. Faust's famulus, a pedant, in Goethe's "Faust." He is also introduced in Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus," with some of the same characteristics.

According to Hinrichs, Faust represents Philosophy, and Wagner Theology. Duntzer calls the latter "the representative of dead pedantry, of knowledge mechanically acquired"; while other critics consider that he symbolizes the Philistine element in German life,—the hopelessly material, prosaic, and commonplace.

Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Wagner (väg'ner), Adolf Heinrich Gotthilf. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, March 25, 1835. A German political economist, son of Rudolf Wagner: professor at Berlin from 1870. He is noted for his works on finance, and as an advocate of the "socialism of the chair."

Wagner, Moritz. Born at Bayreuth, Bavaria, Oct. 3, 1813: died at Munich, 1887. A German traveler, naturalist, and geographer: brother of Rudolf Wagner. He traveled in Algeria 1836–38; in the Black Sea regions, the Caucasus, Kurdistan, Armenia, and Persia 1842–45; in North America 1852–55; and in Panama and Ecuador 1857–59. His works include "Reisen in Algier" (1841), "Der Kaukasus" (1847), "Reise nach Kolchis" (1850), "Reise nach dem Ararat, etc." (1850), "Reise nach Persien, etc." (1852), "Naturwissenschaftliche Reisen in tropischen Amerika" (1870), and "Die Darwin'sche Theorie" (1868) and other works on evolution. He wrote with Scherzer, "Reisen in Nordamerika" (1854), and "Die Republik Costa-Rica" (1856).

Wagner, Richard. See Wagner, Wilhelm Reichard.

Wagner, Rudolf. Born at Bayreuth, Bavaria, June 30, 1805: died at Göttingen, May 13, 1864. A noted German physiologist, comparative anatomist, and anthropologist: professor at Erlangen 1828–34, and at Göttingen from 1840. Among his works are "Lehrbuch der vergleichenden Anatomie" (1834–35), "Icones physiologicæ" (1839–40), "Lehrbuch der Physiologie" (1839), "Handbuch der vergleichenden Anatomie" (1845), "Handwörterbuch der Physiologie" (1842–53), "Neurologische Untersuchungen" (1854), "Der Kampf um die Seele" (1857), "Vorstudien" on the brain (1860–62).

Wagner, Rudolf Johannes von. Born at Leipsic, Feb. 13, 1822: died at Würzburg, Oct. 4, 1880. A German chemist and technologist. He wrote "Lehrbuch der Chemie," "Handbuch der chemischen Technologie," "Theorie und Praxis Gewerbe," "Die chemische Fabrikindustrie," etc.

Wagner, Wilhelm Richard. Born at Leipsic, May 22, 1813: died at Bayreuth, Feb. 13, 1883. A celebrated German operatic composer and poet. His father, who was a clerk to the police-courts of Leipsic, died a few months after his birth, and his mother married Ludwig Geyer and removed to Dresden. He was educated at the Leipsic gymnasium, matriculated at the University of Leipsic in 1830; and studied music at Leipsic. At this time he had a great enthusiasm for Beethoven. He was chorus-master at Würzburg in 1833, in the theater where his elder brother Albert was actor and stage manager; music director at Magdeburg 1834–36; conductor at Königsberg in 1836, when he married Minna Planer; music director at Riga 1837–39; and lived in Paris 1839–42, where he struggled in vain to obtain a footing in some theater, and even offered himself as chorus-singer ("choriste"). He, however, studied and wrote continuously, and finished his "Faust" overture in 1840, though it was not published till 1855: this is his first markedly original performance. In 1841 he composed his "Fliegende Holländer," and endeavored unsuccessfully to get his "Rienzi" produced at Paris. About this time the "Volksbuch" of the Tannhauser legend came into his possession, and he was struck with its capabilities. From this he was led to study the poems of Von Eschenbach and the "Loherangrin." He wrote the first sketches for his "Tannhauser" in 1842. "Rienzi" was produced at Dresden in 1842, and was a success. The next year "Der Fliegende Hollander" was produced there, with Madame Schroder-Devrient as Senta. He was appointed Royal Kapellmeister at Dresden in 1843, where he remained for seven years. "Tannhauser" was produced there in 1845, and was a comparative failure. He got into pecuniary difficulties, his arrest was ordered for alleged participation in the revolutionary movements of 1849; but, with the assistance of Liszt, he escaped to Paris. He lived chiefly at Zurich until 1859; and was in London in 1855 and in Paris 1859–61. Ludwig II., king of Bavaria, sent for him to return to Germany in 1861, and from this time his life was comparatively free from struggle. He settled at Triebschen in 1864, and lived at Treibschen, near Lucerne, 1866–72. In 1869 he married Cosima, the daughter of Liszt; and settled at Bayreuth in 1872. His theater was finished in 1876, but his health becoming to give way, he went to Venice, where he died. He was buried in the grounds of "Wahnfried," his own house at Bayreuth. Among the many characteristics of his art theory are these: the choice of a general subject in which the mythical and heroic elements are prominent; the amalgamation of poetry, music, action, and scenic effect into the most intimate union, so as equally to subserve operating elements; the desertion of the conventionalities of the common Italian opera, especially of its sharply defined and contrasted, and inconsequent melody to display of mere virtuosity; the abundant use of leading motives as a means to continuous and reiterated emotional effect; the elaboration of the orchestral parts, so that in them is furnished an unbroken presentation of or commentary on the entire plot; and the free use of new and remarkable means of effect, both scenic and instrumental. The Wagnerian ideal is often called (sometimes derisively) "the music of the future," from the title of one of Wagner's essays. While Wagnerism is best exemplified in the great dramas of Wagner himself, its qualities may be seen more or less in almost all the dramatic music of the last half of the century. His works include the operas "Rienzi" (1842), "Der Fliegende Holländer" ("The Flying Dutchman," 1843), "Tannhäuser" (first performed in 1845), "Lohengrin" (1850), "Der Ring des Nibelungen" (including "Das Rheingold," "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung"; first performed as a whole in the autumn of 1876), "Tristan und Isolde" (1865), "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" (1868), "Parsifal" (1882); overtures, sonatas, songs, orchestral and choral works, pianoforte pieces, etc. His literary works are contained in ten volumes (1871–83), including the poems for his operas, musical-critical work, "Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft" ("The Art-Work of the Future," 1850), "Oper und Drama," "Beethoven," "Religion und Kunst," "Bayreuther Blatter," etc.

Wagram (vä'gräm), or Deutsch-Wagram (doich'vä'gräm). A village 9 miles northeast of Vienna. Here, July 5–6, 1809, the French under Napoleon (about 150,000) defeated the Austrians (about 130,000) under Archduke Charles. Loss on each side, about 25,000.

Wagram, Prince of. A title of the French general Berthier.

Wagstaff (wag'stäf), Simon. The pseudonym of Swift in "Polite Conversation."

Wahhabees, or Wahabis (wä-hä'bēz). The followers of Abd-el-Wahhab (1691–1787), a Mohammedan reformer, who opposed all practices not sanctioned by the Koran. His successors formed a powerful dominion whose chief seat was in Nejd in central Arabia. They were overthrown by Ibrahim Pasha in 1818, but afterward regained much of their former power in central Arabia. Also Wahhabites.

Wahlstatt (väl'stät), Battle of, or Battle of Liegnitz. A battle between the Mongols and the Germans under Duke Henry II. of Silesia, fought April 9, 1241, at Wahlstatt, a village 6 miles southeast of Liegnitz, in Silesia. The Mongols were victorious, but retired from Germany.

Wahlstatt, Prince of. A title of Blücher, who defeated the French at the battle of the Katzbach, near Wahlstatt, Aug. 26, 1813.

Wahlverwandschaften (väl'fer-vänt-shäf'ten), Die. [G., 'Elective Affinities.'] A romance by Goethe, published in 1809.

Wahnfried (vän'fred). [G., literally 'illusion peace.'] The villa where Wagner lived during the later years of his life at Bayreuth. He was buried in the grounds. An inscription on the house means in English 'Here, where I found the fulfilment of my Ideal — Wahnfried — So shall this house be named.'

Wahrheit und Dichtung (vär'hīt önd dich'tōng). [G., 'Truth and Poetry.'] An autobiographical work by Goethe. Three volumes were published in 1811, 1812, 1814, and the fourth was published after his death, from discovered materials.

Wahsatch (wä-sach') Mountains. A range of mountains which extends from north to south through Utah, and forms the eastern wall of the Great Basin. Highest point, Mount Nebo (about 12,000 feet).

Waiblingen (vī'bling-en). A town in the Neckar circle, Würtemberg, situated on the Rems 7 miles northeast of Stuttgart. Compare Hohenstaufen. Population (1890), 4,786.

Waiblinger (vī'bling-er). A surname of the Hohenstaufens, who held Waiblingen in the 12th century. From it came by corruption the Italian "Ghibelline."

Wailatpuan (wī'ē-lat-pū'an). [From wayiletpu, the plural of weilet, a Cayuse man.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, formerly living in Oregon and Washington. The Cayuse and Molale are the two tribes of this stock. Number (1895), about 446.

Wain (wān), Charles's. In astronomy, the seven brightest stars in the constellation Ursa Major, or the Great Bear, which has been called a wagon since the time of Homer. Two of the stars are known as "the pointers," because, being nearly in a straight line with the pole-star, they direct an observer to it. Also Bear's Wain, Great Dipper, the Northern Car, and sometimes the Butcher's Cleaver. [The name Charles's Wain, or Charles' Wain, is a modern alteration of the earlier carle's wain, from late AS. carles wæn, the carl's or churl's wain, or farmer's wagon. The word wain came to be associated with the name Charles with reference to Charlemagne, the group being also called in ME. Charlemaynes wayne. In the 17th century it was associated with the names of Charles I. and Charles II.]

Wain, The Lesser. Ursa Minor.

Wäinamöinen. See the extract.

The Kalevala begins with a cosmogony, which certainly offers interesting features for comparison, but in which there is much that may be foreign to the original heathen conceptions. Then the epic deals with the adventures of the three heroes Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen, and Lemminkainen. These heroes of Kaleva go into the hostile northcountry of Pohjola as suitors, to fetch a bride, who is finally won by Ilmarinen: they return later to rob the Sampo treasure. Amongst the other characters is Louhi, mistress of Pohjola, lays upon them is a journey to Tuonela, with which a description of the lower regions is connected.
La Siussaye, Science of Religion, p. 304.

Waite (wāt), Morrison Remick. Born at Lyme, Conn., Nov. 29, 1816; died at Washington, D. C., March 23, 1888. An American jurist. He graduated at Yale in 1837; was admitted to the bar in 1839; became a leader of the bar in Ohio; was counsel for the United States before the Geneva tribunal of arbitration 1871–72; and was appointed chief justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1874.

In 1504 he became professor of geography in the college founded by the Duke of Lorraine at St. Dié. In 1507 he published a little treatise in Latin, the "Cosmographiæ introductio," printed on the college press in several editions, all of which are very rare. Latin translations of the letters of Vespucci (see that name) are given as an appendix. In this book he says: "And the fourth part of the world having been discovered by Americus it may be called America; that is, the land of Americus or America." This suggestion, in an obscure book, was eventually adopted, and America thus became the name of the New World. It should be noted that Waldseemüller proposed the name only for the region now known as South America, to which it was restricted for some time. Waldseemüller, with Engmann ("Philesius"), Walter Lud ("Ludovicus"), and other young students at St. Dié, prepared an edition of Ptolemy which was eventually published by Waldseemüller at Strasburg (1513). It contains curious maps of the New World, but the name America does not appear in it.

Wandering Jew. A legendary character who, according to one version (that of Matthew Paris, dating from the 13th century), was a servant of Pilate, by name Cartaphilus (afterward baptized Joseph), and gave Christ a blow when he was led out of the palace to execution. According to a later version he was a cobbler, named Ahasuerus, who refused Christ permission to sit down and rest when he passed his house on the way to Golgotha. Both legends agree in the sentence pronounced by Christ on the offender, "Thou shalt wander on the earth till I return." A prey to remorse, he has since wandered from land to land without being able to find the grave. There are many later versions, and the story has been turned to account by numerous painters and novelists. He is introduced in Edgar Quinet's "Ahasvers," and by Chamisso, A. W. Schlegel, Lenau, H. C. Anderson, George Croly (in his novel "Salathiel"), Eugene Sue (in his novel "Le Juif Errant"), and others. He is reported to have appeared in different cities and countries at intervals, the last noted was in England in 1830. Gustave Doré illustrated the story in a series of woodcuts of great originality. There is also an older Italian story of a Jew, named Malchus, who struck Christ with an iron glove, and was condemned to whirl ceaselessly round an underground pillar until the last day.

It contains the forest of Arden and the towns of Birmingham, Stratford-on-Avon, and Coventry. It formed a part of the ancient Mercia. Area, 902 square miles. Population (1891), 905,076.

Warwick. The capital of Warwickshire, situated on the Avon in lat. 52° 16′ N., long. 1° 35′ W. It contains a famous castle, with machicolated towers and battlemented walls, the effect of which is much enhanced by their framing of splendid trees. The great Cæsar's Tower dates back almost to the Conquest. The spacious residential buildings are of the 15th century and later, extensively restored; they contain many historical relics, paintings, and works of art, among them the large sculptured Warwick vase, found in Badrian's villa at Tivoli. St. Mary's is a large Perpendicular church, in great part rebuilt in 1694. The interior is impressive, and contains interesting brasses and other medieval monuments. The church is chiefly notable for the superb Beauchamp Chapel, dating from 1464. The architecture of the chapel is florid Perpendicular, and it contains the beautifully sculptured tombs of the earls of Warwick and of Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester. Warwick was a British settlement, and became a Roman fortress about 50 A. D. It was rebuilt by Ethelfleda about 915. Population (1891), 11,905.

Warwick

Warwick, Earl of (Richard Nevil or Neville). Born about 1428; killed at the battle of Barnet, April 14, 1471. An English politician and commander; called "the King-Maker." He was related to both the Yorkist and the Lancastrian families. He inherited the title of earl of Salisbury, and became earl of Warwick through his marriage with the daughter of Richard Beauchamp (earl of Warwick). At first he sided with the Yorkists, and served at the first battle of St. Albans in 1455; was made governor of Calais; again joined the Yorkists in 1459; defeated the Lancastrians at Northampton in July, 1460, and took Henry VI. prisoner; was defeated at St. Albans in 1461 by Margaret; joined with Edward IV. and entered London in 1461; won with Edward the victory of Towton in 1461; was made warden of the Scottish marches, constable of Dover, lord high chamberlain, etc.; and repressed the Lancastrian rising in 1463-64. He opposed the marriage of Edward IV. with Elizabeth Woodville, and the alliance with Burgundy; and was driven into revolt by the king, whom he took prisoner in 1469, but soon released. He conspired with his son-in-law Clarence against Edward IV. in 1470; fled to France; adopted the cause of the Lancastrians; landed in Devon, and drove Edward IV. to Flanders, and restored Henry VI. in 1470; but was overthrown by Edward IV. at Barnet in 1471.

Washington (wosh'ing-ton). One of the Pacific States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 45° 40′ to 49° N., and from long. 117° to 124° 44′ W. Capital, Olympia; chief cities, Seattle and Tacoma. It is bounded by the Straits of Juan de Fuca and British Columbia on the north, Idaho on the east, Oregon (partly separated by the Columbia River) on the south, and the Pacific on the west. The Cascade Mountains traverse the State from south to north. It has rich forests, particularly in the west, and extensive deposits of coal and iron; and gold and silver are found. There is an extensive wheat region in the east. The salmon-fisheries are important, and ship-building is a flourishing industry. Washington has 34 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. The Strait of Juan de Fuca was discovered in 1592, and explored in 1789; the mouth of the Columbia was explored by the American captain Gray in 1792; and further explorations were conducted by Lewis and Clark in 1805. A settlement at the mouth of the Columbia was founded by John Jacob Astor in 1811. The boundary was settled with Great Britain in 1846. Washington formed part of the Territory of Oregon; was organized as a Territory in 1853; and was admitted to the Union in 1889. Area, 69,994 square miles. Population (1890), 349,390.

Washington. The capital of the United States, forming part of the District of Columbia, situated on the Potomac, at the head of navigation, in lat. 38° 53′ N., long. 77° 1′ W. It has become a favorite city of resort of late years, and is noted for its public buildings, the most important being the Capitol (which see). The White House, the official residence of the President, is a handsome mansion in the English Renaissance style, with a projecting columned and pedimented porch on the entrance front, and a large semicircular projecting bay on the garden front opposite. Its chief rooms are details are sober and well designed, both outside and inside, but it has become too small for the official and social needs of the chief of the government. The corner-stone of the White House was laid by General Washington, and it was first occupied in 1800 by John Adams. Besides the buildings for the various government departments, the National Museum, Smithsonian Institution, etc., are notable. The Washington monument is an obelisk-shaped tower of white marble, erected in honor of George Washington. It is 555 feet 5 inches high to its apex, and 55 feet square at the base. The corner-stone was laid on July 4, 1848, but after a short time the work languished and then stopped entirely, until in 1876 Congress voted the completion of the monument, which was accordingly done in 1884. The site for the capital was chosen in 1790, and the government removed from Philadelphia in 1800. The public buildings were burned by the British in 1814. The city was the Federal military headquarters in the Civil War, and was threatened by the Confederates under Early in 1864. Its municipal government is limited in its rights and a territorial government established in that year. This was abolished in 1874, and the present form instituted (see District of Columbia). Population (1890), 188,932.

Washington. The capital of Davie County, Indiana, 92 miles southwest of Indianapolis. Population (1890), 6,064.

Washington. The capital of Washington County, Pennsylvania, situated on Chartiers Creek 24 miles southwest of Pittsburg. Population (1890), 7,063.

Washington, Bushrod. Born in Westmoreland County, Va., 1762; died at Philadelphia, 1829. An American jurist, nephew of George Washington. He was a member of the Virginia House of Delegates, and of the Virginia ratifying convention of 1788; and was associate justice of the United States Supreme Court 1798–1829.

Washington, George. Born in Westmoreland County, Va., Feb. 22 (O. S. Feb. 11), 1732; died at Mount Vernon, Dec. 14, 1799. A famous American soldier and statesman, the first President of the United States. He was the son of Augustine Washington, a Virginia planter. He was at school until he was about 15 years of age, and received a surveyor's outfit. He was appointed adjutant of Virginia troops in 1751; inherited Mount Vernon on the death of his brother in 1752; was made by Dinwiddie commander of a military district of Virginia in 1753; was sent on a mission to the United authorities beyond the Allegheny River 1753–54; was appointed lieutenant-colonel in 1754; had a successful skirmish with the French, and defeated them at Great Meadows; but was obliged to surrender on July 3; was a volunteer aide-de-camp to Braddock in the battle of the Monongahela in 1755, and brought off the Virginians' remnants on the frontier 1755–57; and led the advance-guard in Forbes's expedition for the reduction of Fort Duquesne in 1758. On Jan. 9, 1759, he married Martha Custis (widow of John Parke Custis), very soon after which he resigned his commission. He was a delegate to the Virginia House of Burgesses, and to the Continental Congresses of 1774 and 1775; was appointed commander-in-chief of the Continental army June 15, 1775; arrived at Cambridge July 2, and took command; and compelled the evacuation of Boston on March 17, 1776. He was defeated at the battle of Long Island Aug. 27, 1776, and at White Plains Oct. 28, 1776; he retreated through New Jersey; surprised the British at Trenton Dec. 26; won the victory of Princeton Jan., 1777; was defeated at Brandywine and Germantown in 1777; was at Valley Forge during the winter of 1777–78; fought the drawn battle of Monmouth in 1778; compelled the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in 1781; his campaigns against the commander-in-chief at Annapolis in 1783; and retired to Mount Vernon. In 1787 he was president of the Constitutional Convention; was unanimously elected President of the United States in Jan., 1789, and inaugurated at New York April 30, 1789; and was unanimously reelected in 1793, serving until 1797. Among the chief events in his administrations were the establishment of the machinery of government, the crystallization of parties, the regulation of commerce and finance, the admission of Vermont, Kentucky, and Tennessee, the Indian wars, the "whisky insurrection," and the Jay treaty. He issued his farewell address to the people in Sept., 1796. He was appointed lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of the army in anticipation of a war with France in 1798.

In civil as in military life, he (Washington) was preeminent among his contemporaries for the clearness and soundness of his judgment, for his perfect moderation and self-control, for the quiet dignity and the indomitable firmness with which he pursued every path which he had deliberately chosen. Of all the great men in history he was the most invariably judicious, and there is scarcely a rash word or action or judgment recorded of him. Those who knew him well, noticed that he had keen sensibilities and strong passions; but his power of self-command never failed him, and no one of his public faults can be traced to personal rancor, ambition, or resentment. In the despondency of long-continued failure, in the elation of success, at times when his soldiers were deserting by hundreds, and when malignant plots were formed against his reputation, amid the constant quarrels, rivalries, and jealousies of his subordinates, in the dark hour of national ingratitude, and in the midst of the most universal and intoxicating flattery, he was always the same calm, wise, just, and single-minded man, pursuing the course which he believed to be right, without fear or favour or fanaticism, equally free from the passions that spring from interest, and from the passions that spring from imagination. He never acted on the impulse of an absorbing or uncalculating enthusiasm, and he valued very highly fortune, position, and reputation; but at the command of duty he was generally ready and sometimes to recall. He was in the highest sense of the words a gentleman and a man of honour, and he carried into public life the severest standard of private morals. It was at first the constant dread of large sections of the American people that if the old Government were overthrown, they would fall into the hands of military adventurers, and undergo the yoke of military despotism. It was mainly the transparent integrity of the character of Washington that dispelled the fear. It was always known by his friends, and it was soon acknowledged by those who mistrusted all their friends themselves, that in Washington America had found a leader who could be induced by no earthly motive to tell a falsehood, or to break an engagement, or to commit any dishonourable act. Men of commanding genius appear not rare, and we have all met them in our experience; but there is scarcely another instance in history of such a man having reached and long retained the highest position in the convulsions of civil war and of a great popular agitation.

Lecky, England in the XVIIIth Century, III. 450-451.

The Wasp was never heard from again.

Wasps (wosps), The. A comedy by Aristophanes, exhibited in 422 B. C.

The play ("Wasps") is not so brilliant as the "Clouds," and is intended to ridicule the simplicity of the body of power Athenian citizens who spent their life sitting in judgment upon all the affairs of the empire, and receiving their three obols daily by way of support. They imagined themselves the rulers of the empire, whereas they were really the tools of demagogues and of rhetoricians who pocketed the real profits.

Waterloo, Battle of. A decisive victory gained near Waterloo (a village south of Brussels), June 18, 1815, by the Allies over Napoleon. The Prussians often call the battle Belle Alliance, and the French Mont St.-Jean, after localities near Waterloo. The French numbered about 72,000; the allied British, Dutch, and German, under the Duke of Wellington, numbered about 67,000: the Prussians (about 50,000 additional), under Blücher, marched to the battle-field and took part in the close and in the pursuit. The battle commenced about 11:30 A. M. The features were the unavailing charges of the French and the stubborn resistance of the British contingent, under the last charge of the French Old Guard in the evening, which failed and was followed by an advance of the combined armies. The Allies lost about 22,000; the French about 35,000, besides many prisoners. (See Grouchy.) The rout was so complete and the disaster to Napoleon so decisive that "Waterloo" is proverbial for a final and decisive blow. The preliminary battles were at Ligny and Quatre-Bras (which see).

Waterloo Bridge. A bridge over the Thames at London, called by Canova the finest bridge in Europe: designed and built by John Rennie. The first stone was laid Oct. 11, 1811, and the bridge was opened June 18, 1817, the second anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. Weird Sisters, The. The three witches in Shakspere's "Macbeth."

The Weird Sisters are as true a creation of Shakspere's as his Ariel and Caliban,—fates, furies, and materializing witches being the elements. They are wholly different from any representation of witches in the contemporary writers, and yet presented a sufficient external resemblance to the creatures of vulgar prejudice to act immediately on the audience. Their character consists in the imaginative discord of evil from the earth, the grave, the dark, unsexual, and fearfully anomalous of physical nature, the lawless of human nature,—elemental avengers without sex or kin.

Wells (welz). A town in the county of Somerset, England, situated at the foot of the Mendip Hills, 17 miles southwest of Bath. It is the seat of a bishopric, now conjoined with that of Bath. The cathedral is in the main of the first half of the 13th century, with square central tower and Lady chapel of the 14th. The plan shows square choir and single transepts. The wide west front, flanked by towers, is somewhat of the character of that of Salisbury in its superposed and monotonous tiers of arcading; it is more like cabinet-work than architecture, but the details are beautiful. The interior is impressive in general effect, but is architecturally inorganic, having no vaulting-shafts in the nave. The western transept-piers, showing weakness, were buttressed in 1338 by the insertion between them of a pair of massive arches, apex to apex—a curious device. The beautiful choir is separated from the nave by a Perpendicular screen, and its walls are arcaded. The Lady chapel is famous for lightness and beauty. The dimensions of the cathedral are 383 by 83 feet; the height of the vaulting, from 67 to 73. There is a beautiful octagonal chapter-house with central pillar, Perpendicular cloisters, and a picturesque 13th-century bishop's palace. Population (1891), 4,822.

Wentworth, Thomas, Earl of Strafford. Born at London, April 13, 1593: executed at London, May 12, 1641. A famous English statesman. He entered Parliament in 1614; and was an opponent of the policy of James I., and until 1628–29 of that of Charles I. In 1628 he was raised to the peerage; became president of the Council of the North in 1628; was made a privy councilor in 1629; was appointed lord deputy of Ireland 1632, and arrived there 1633; and became the chief adviser of Charles I. In 1640 he was made earl of Strafford and lord lieutenant of Ireland; commanded the army against the Scots in that year; was impeached by the Long Parliament; and was condemned by a bill of attainder.

He was accused on twenty-eight counts which concerned his conduct towards England, Ireland, and Scotland. The chief was that he had incensed his majesty against the members of the late Parliament telling him "they had denied to supply him, and that his majesty having tried the affections of his people, and been refused, he was absolved from all rules of government, and that he had an army in Ireland which he might employ to reduce this kingdom (State Trials)." The Lords refused to admit as evidence a paper found by Sir Harry Vane which supported his father's evidence on this charge. For which cause the Commons brought in a bill of attainder.

Ashurst and Emmanuel.

Wergeland (ver'ge-länd), Henrik Arnold Thaulow. Born at Christiansand, June 17, 1808: died at Christiania, July 12, 1845. A Norwegian poet. His father was a clergyman, and one of the members of the Constitutional convention of Eidsvold, and pastor there after 1817. He studied at the Christiania University after 1825, and began to write in 1827. His first productions were a series of satirical farces (among them "Ah!; Om Smag og Behag [Ah!; On Taste and Decency]" ("There is no disputing about taste") and "Papegøien" ("The Parrot"), all published under the pseudonym Sifui Sifadda. In 1829 appeared "Skabelsen, Mennesket og Messias" ("The Creation, Man and Messiah"). Subsequent works were the drama "Campbellerne," and the poem "Spanieden" (1833). In the meantime the poet Welhaven had made in a pamphlet, in 1832, a personal attack upon him for his aims of poetical emancipation; and in 1834, in the poem "Norway's Twilight," had censured the misplaced zeal of the ultra-national faction which Wergeland represented. At the production of his drama "Campbellerne" ("The Campbells") the feud came to an open outbreak in the theater. Subsequently his fortunes steadily declined. He was deprived by the king of an official position, and then became involved in a lawsuit which took from him part of his property. Some of his best work, however, was done after this time. Particularly to be mentioned are "Jan van Huysum og Blomsterne [Jan van Huysum's Flower-piece]," a series of lyrics; the poem "Svalen" ("The Swallow"); the plays "Jøden" ("The Jew") and "Jødinden" ("The Jewess"); and, finally, his last and greatest poem, "Den engelske Lods" ("The English Pilot"). His collected works were published at Christiania, 1852–1859, in 9 vols.

Werner (ver'ner). A tragedy by Lord Byron: so called from the name of its hero, a mysterious and morbid character. Macready produced this play in 1830, and Werner was considered one of his most powerful parts.

Of the "German's Tale" (by Harriet Lee) he [Byron] confessed: "It made a deep impression on me, and may be said to contain the germ of more that I have since written." It not only contained the germ of "Werner," but supplied the whole material for that tragedy. All the characters of the piece are reproduced in it, except "Ida," whom he added. The plan of Miss Lee's work is exactly followed, as the poet admitted, and even the language is frequently borrowed without essential change.

Tuckerman, Hist. of English Prose Fiction, p. 256.

Werner (ver'ner), Abraham Gottlob. Born at Wehrau, Upper Lusatia, Sept. 25, 1750: died at Dresden, June 30, 1817. A celebrated German mineralogist and geologist, the founder of scientific geology; instructor in the Mining Academy in Freiberg from 1775. He was the propounder of the "Neptunian theory," which regarded all igneous origin various formations now considered to be volcanic, and which aroused much discussion. His works include "Über die ausseren Kennzeichen der Fossilien" (1774), "Kurze Klassifikation und Beschreibung der Gebirgsarten" (1787), "Neue Theorie über die Entstehung der Gänge" (1791), etc.

An English Methodist clergyman and hymn-writer, brother of John Wesley: famous as a hymn-writer. He was educated at Westminster School and at Christ Church, Oxford. He accompanied his brother John to Georgia 1735-36.

Wesley, John. Born at Epworth, England, June 28, 1703; died at London, March 2, 1791. An English clergyman, son of Samuel Wesley; famous as the founder of Methodism. He was educated at Charterhouse school and at Christ Church, Oxford; became fellow of Lincoln College in 1726; and was curate to his father 1727-29. In the latter year he settled at Oxford, where he became the leader of a band of young men conspicuous for their religious earnestness: they were somewhat derisively called "Methodists." Their regularity and strict method of their lives and studies He went to Georgia as a missionary in 1735, returning to England in 1738. At first he was allied with the Moravians, but soon abandoned all ecclesiastical traditions and established the Methodist Church. In 1739 he began open-air preaching. His first Methodist conference was held in 1744. His literary work, also, was extensive.

After elementary instruction in Christiania, he went in 1761 to the Copenhagen University, where he studied the succeeding year. Subsequently he supported himself by teaching modern languages. In 1778 he was made translator to the Royal Theater. His one important literary work written when he was 30 years old, is the tragedy "Kjærlighed uden Stromper" ("Love without Stockings"), a parody on the French tragedies: these he revenge on the Danish stage, from which it effectually banished them. Two other dramas are of but little value. He wrote, besides, a few lyrics and humorous ballads in verse. His poems were published in a collected form at Copenhagen in 1787.

Wessex (wes'eks). [ME. Wessex, Westsaxe, AS. Westseaxe, West Saxons, Cf. Essex, Sussex.] One of the Saxon kingdoms in England, which became the nucleus of the kingdom of England. The settlement of the West Saxons under Cerdic and Cynric on the west of Hampshire took place in 495, and the kingdom spread north and west to Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Dorset. Wessex obtained the overlordship in Britain under Egbert in the first part of the 9th century; was reduced in power by the Danes; and made Alfred's successors declared it to the kingdom of England. It was an earldom in the 10th and 11th centuries, comprising the territory south of the Thames.

Western, Squire. In Fielding's novel "Tom Jones," a hunting squire of gross speech and ungoverned and brutal temper, the father of the fair Sophia. His redeeming trait is his affection for his daughter, whom, however, he treats in a most tyrannical fashion.

> But, above all, what shall we say of Squire Western, next to Falstaff the most universally popular of comic creations? . . . His shrewdness, his avarice, his coarse kindness, his sanctified hypocrisy, his irresistible and unreasonableness; his brutal anger, making the page which chronicles it shake with oaths, interjections, and screaming interrogations; — loving his daughter, loving his dogs and horses, and willing to use the whip and the spur the moment she does not obey him with due alacrity, as in the case of his other brutes; and loving himself with a depth of affection, with a disregard of everything else on and over the earth, which touches the pathetic in selfishness; — all these go to make up a character so natural, and yet so eccentric, as to distract our faith in the drama that reason is the separating line between man and the beast.

West Indies

West Indies (in'dēz). [Formerly West Indias; G. West Indien, F. Antilles, Sp. Antillas or Indias Occidentales.] An archipelago between North and South America, extending in a curve from Florida to the peninsula of Paria, and separating the Caribbean Sea from the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. The principal groups distinguished are the Greater Antilles (Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico, and Jamaica); the Bahamas, north of Cuba; and the Lesser Antilles, or Caribbee Islands, forming a line at the southeastern extremity of the group. Most of the Bahamas are low. Nearly all the other islands are mountainous, and in the Lesser Antilles there are many active and extinct volcanoes. With the exception of some of the Bahamas, the entire group lies within the tropics, and the climate and productions of all are essentially tropical. The principal products are sugar, tobacco, and coffee. Nearly all the islands are occasionally visited by hurricanes, which are sometimes very destructive; the hurricane months are from June to October inclusive. Columbus discovered the Bahamas, Cuba, and Haiti in 1492, and nearly all the islands were known before the continent of America was discovered. They were supposed to be outlying islands of India or Asia, and, as they had been found by sailing westward, they were called the West Indies. Later the name included for a time the known portions of the continent. The Greater Antilles were colonized by the Spanish, who claimed the whole group; but later many of the smaller islands were seized by French, English, and Dutch adventurers, and their wars with one another and with the Spaniards were continued intermittently until 1815, the smaller colonies frequently changing masters. Many African slaves were brought in, and their descendants form a large proportion of the population. At present (1894) Cuba, Porto Rico, and some of the smaller islands are colonies of Spain; Haiti is divided between two independent states: Jamaica, the Bahamas, and some of the Lesser Antilles belong to England; and the latter are divided between France, Denmark, and the Netherlands.

Westmacott (west'ma-kot), Sir Richard. Born at London, 1775: died Sept. 1, 1856. An English sculptor. In 1793 he was a pupil of Canova at Rome. In 1827 he succeeded Flaxman as professor of sculpture in the Royal Academy. He executed monuments in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. His statues include those of Fox, the dukes of York and Bedford, George III., Achilles, etc.

Westminster (west'min-ster). A former city, now a part of London. It is bounded by Marylebone on the east, Temple Bar on the east, the Thames on the east and south, and Kensington and Chelsea on the west. It is noted for the abbey, around which it grew up, and for the houses of Parliament and government buildings.

Westminster, Provisions of. Ordinances passed through the influence of the barons in Parliament at Westminster, 1259. "They embodied the grievances of the barons stated at Oxford, and mainly concerned the administration of justice and local government by the sheriff."

Westminster Abbey. A famous church in Westminster, London, founded on the site of an earlier church by Edward the Confessor, and rebuilt in the 13th century by Henry III. and Edward I. The highly ornate chapel of Henry VII., at the east end, was built by that king in the early 16th century. The dimensions, including the chapel, are 513 by 75 feet; length of transepts, 200; height of vaulting, 102. The incongruous square towers were designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The north transept façade is very fine: it has 3 handsome portals, a graceful arcade, and a large wheel. The interior is extremely impressive, the proportions and the details being good: the triforium is of especial beauty. The handsome reredos, of red and white alabaster, is modern, as are the choir-stalls. Henry VII.'s chapel has nave and aisles and 5 radiating chapels in the chevet: it is a notable example of florid Perpendicular, especially remarkable for the fan-tracery and pendants of its ceiling. The rich and appropriate tombs to the knights and squires of the Bath: over each are suspended a sword and a banner. The abbey is worldfamous as the chief burial-place of Great Britain's distinguished men; comparatively few of the monuments are artistically interesting. The south transept constitutes the famous Poets' Corner: it contains memorials to a large number of the names honored in English literature. The choir-chapels contain medieval and Renaissance monuments of higher intrinsic interest, especially Henry VII.'s chapel: that church monument of that kind, in metal, by Torregiano, is inclosed in a rich Perpendicular chantry of brass. Several other kings and princes are buried in this chapel, and in that of Edward the Confessor, which occupies the extremity of the choir. The Early English chapter-house is octagonal, with central column. The fine cloisters also contain tombs.

Westminster Assembly, or Assembly of Divines at Westminster. A convocation summoned by the Long Parliament to advise "for the settling of the liturgy and the government of the Church of England." Most of its members were Presbyterians, and nearly all were Calvinists. It met July 1, 1643, and continued its sessions until Feb. 22, 1649. The chief fruits of its labors were the Directory of Public Worship, the Confession of Faith, and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which were rejected in England but established in Scotland.

Westminster Bridge. The oldest bridge but one over the Thames at London. The first bridge was designed by Labelye, a Swiss architect. The original plan contemplated a wooden structure, but it was changed to stone after the "great frost" of 1739. The piers were built of solid blocks of Portland stone, on caissons which were the largest that had been constructed up to that time. It was begun in 1739 and completed in 1750. It was 1,220 feet long, 40 feet wide, 58 feet high, and the central span was 76 feet wide: there were 15 arches. In 1856–1862 it was replaced by the present stone and iron structure, consisting of 7 iron arches on granite piers, built by Page: it is 1,160 feet long and 85 feet wide.

Westminster Hall. A structure adjoining the houses of Parliament on the west, forming part of the ancient palace of Westminster. It was begun by William Rufus, burned at the end of the 12th century, and restored by Edward II. and Richard II. It has a magnificent framed hammer-beam roof, in a single span 68 feet wide: the length is 290 and the height 92. Here sat some of the first English Parliaments; here, until George IV., the coronation festivities were held; and here Charles I. was condemned, and Cromwell saluted as Lord Protector. The hall now serves as a vestibule to the houses of Parliament. Below it on the east is the crypt of St. Stephen, or Church of St. Mary Undercroft, a rich and Pointed chapel, in exterior and interior decoration somewhat resembling the lower chapel of Sainte Chapelle, Paris: the rich cloisters were built by Henry VIII.

Westminster Palace. 1. The houses of Parliament.—2. A former royal residence in Westminster. A palace is supposed to have existed at Westminster in the reign of Canute (1017–35). Its importance, however, begins with Edward the Confessor (1042–66). Various additions were made by his successors until Henry III. (1216–72), in whose reign work was constantly in progress. His palace was richly decorated with pictures in oil-color—according to Walpole the first recorded use of that medium. It was repeatedly visited by fire, and in 1512 (reign of Henry VIII.) all the living apartments were destroyed. It was not completely repaired until July 18, 1822, when George IV. spent the night before his coronation there. The entire palace, except Westminster Hall, was burned in 1834.

Westminster School. A noted preparatory school at Westminster. It was established in the abbey by Henry VIII., and was reestablished by Elizabeth.

It may be regarded as succeeding the Roundheads, country party, and Exclusionists (Petitioners). It professed more liberal principles than the Tories, and favored and defended the revolution of 1688, Parliamentary control, and the Hanoverian succession. The great Whig families controlled the government for many years from the beginning of the reign of George I. Among the later leaders were Fox and Burke. About the time of the Reform Bill of 1832 (which the Whigs favored) the name began to be replaced by Liberal. See Liberal. Sometimes the more conservative members of the Liberal party are still called Whigs. 2. The patriotic or American party during the Revolutionary period.—3. An American political party formed under the leadership of Henry Clay, and known until about 1854 as the National Republican. It favored a broad construction of the Constitution, and supported a high protective tariff and internal improvements. Its presidents were Harrison and Tyler (1841–45) and Taylor and Fillmore (1849–53). It became divided on the slavery question, lost the election of 1852, and soon after disappeared.

Whipple (hwip'l), Edwin Percy. Born at Gloucester, Mass., March 8, 1819: died at Boston, June 16, 1886. An American critic and essayist. Whisky Insurrection or Rebellion. An outbreak in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, in 1794, against the enforcement of an act of Congress of 1791 imposing an excise duty on all spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills. A large body of militia, under Governor Lee of Virginia, was sent by Washington to the disturbed district, but the insurrection was suppressed without bloodshed.

Whisky Ring. A conspiracy of distillers and United States government officials, formed to defraud the government of the excise taxes. It existed about 1872–75.

Whistlecraft (hwis'l-kräft), William and Robert. A pseudonym of John Hookham Frere. He wrote a "Prospectus and Specimen of an intended National Work, by William and Robert Whistlecraft, of Stowmarket, in Suffolk, Harness and Collar Makers, intended to comprise the most interesting Particulars relating to King Arthur and his Round Table." In this work he introduced the bernesque style into the English language. Byron, when sending "Beppo" to his publisher, writes: "I have written a poem humorous, in or after the excellent manner of Mr. Whistlecraft, and founded on a Venetian anecdote which amused me. . . . Whistlecraft is my immediate model, but Berni is the father of that kind of writing; which, I think, suits our language, too, very well."

Whistler (hwis'lėr), James Abbott McNeill. Born at Lowell, Mass., 1834. A distinguished American-English painter and etcher. He was educated at West Point, and studied art in Paris. He removed to London in 1863, and in 1886 was elected president of the Society of British Artists. He is especially noted for his etchings. White Company, The. [F. La Compagnie Blanche.] A band of assassins organized in Toulouse in the 13th century by "the ferocious Folquet," bishop of Toulouse. He marched at their head, massacring all who were suspected of favoring heretical opinions. This company joined the army of Simon de Montfort in the Albigensian Crusade. It was also assumed by a band of freebooters led by Bertrand du Guesclin in 1366, from the white cross which each wore on his shoulder. They ransomed from captivity for the purpose of making use of these adventurers, whose numbers were increased by discharged soldiers. It was attempted to send them on a crusade, but Charles V. used them in other ways. The name was also given, probably on account of their equipment, to another band of adventurers led by Sir John Hawkwood, who ravaged the northern part of Italy during the 14th century.

White Czar, or White King, The. An epithet of the Czar of Russia.

White Devil, The, or Vittoria Corombona. A tragedy by Webster, first acted in 1607 or 1608. It was printed in 1612. See Corombona.

But when these criticisms and others are made, "The White Devil" remains one of the most glorious works of the period. Vittoria is perfect throughout; and in the justly lauded trial scene she has no superior on the stage. Brachhiano is a thoroughly lifelike portrait of the man who is completely beguiled with an evil woman. Flamineo I have spoken of, and not favourably: yet in literature, if not in life, he is a triumph; and, above all, the absorbing tragic interest of the play, which it is impossible to take up without finishing, has to be counted in. But the real charm of "The White Devil" is the wholly miraculous poetry in phrases and short passages which it contains.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 278.

White Elephant, Land of the. Siam.

Whitehall Palace. A palace in London, England, originally built by Robert de Burgh in the reign of Henry III. It became the residence of the archbishops of York in 1248, and was called York Place for the two centuries. It should not be confounded with York House. It escheated to the crown under Henry VIII. In 1645 it was nearly destroyed by fire. James I. undertook to rebuild the palace, but only the existing banqueting-hall, designed by Inigo Jones, was finished at the opening of the civil war. The remainder of the palace has since disappeared. The banqueting-hall is one of the best examples of the Palladian style, 111 by 55½ feet, and 55½ high. The ceiling is covered with paintings by Rubens representing the Apotheosis of James I., incidents in the life of Charles I., and allegories of Peace, Plenty, and similar subjects. Through an opening broken in the wall between the upper and the lower central windows Charles I. walked to the scaffold. The banqueting-hall was turned into a chapel by George I., but has never been consecrated. It is called "the Chapel Royal of Whitehall," and was disunited in 1896.

Whittington (hwit'ing-ton). A town in Derbyshire, England, 9 miles south by east of Sheffield. Population (1891), 8,798.

Whittington, Sir Richard. Born about 1358: died March, 1423. Lord Mayor of London. He was a son of Sir Richard Whittington of Pauntley, Gloucestershire, who died in an obscure station. He was an alderman and sheriff of London, and was chosen mayor in 1397, 1406, and 1419. In 1416 he was elected member of Parliament for London. The legend which depicts him as going up to London to seek his fortune, which he finally achieves by means of his cat, has no foundation in fact; but the phrase "Whittington and his cat" is supposed to be a corruption of the word acat or achat, used in the 14th century, meaning 'trading' or 'barter,' round which the nursery tale grew. There is an Eastern legend of the same nature, which probably affected the form of the story.

Wieland (vē'länd), Christopher Martin. Born at Oberholzheim, near Biberach, Sept. 5, 1733: died at Weimar, Jan. 20, 1813. A German poet and author. His father was a clergyman in the Swabian village where the poet was born. In 1750 he went to Tubingen to study jurisprudence at the university. The following year (1751) appeared his first work, the philosophical didactic poem "Die Natur der Dinge" ("The Nature of Things"). This was followed by other moral writings, among them an "Anti-Ovid." In 1752, at the invitation of the poet and historian Bodmer, he went to Zurich, where the next year he published the poem "Der geprufte Abraham" ("The Trial of Abraham"). Other poems of this period are "Sympathien" ("Sympathies"), and the "Empfindungen des Christen" ("The Feelings of the Christian," 1755), directed against the Anacreontic poets. In 1759 he left Zurich to take the position of tutor at Bern. The following year, however, he returned to Biberach, where he was given a minor legal position. His writings subsequently exhibit an entirely different tendency from the poems of the Zurich period. They are the prose romance "Araspes und Panthea" (1761); a translation in whole or in part of twenty-two of the plays of Shakspere, between 1762 and 1766; the romance (in the manner of "Don Quixote") "Don Sylvio von Rosalva" (1764); "Komische Erzahlungen" ("Humorous Tales," 1765); the most celebrated of his novels, "Agathon," (1766–67); the narratives in verse "Musarion" and "Idris" (both 1768). In 1769 he was made professor of philosophy and literature at the University of Erfurt, where he remained until 1772, when he went to Weimar as tutor to the young prince Charles Augustus. He subsequently lived in or near Weimar until his death. After his removal to Erfurt had appeared, further, in the same vein as the works immediately preceding, "Der Sarr des Glucks," "Ein Schritt vom Wege," "Die Realisten," etc.

In 1828 he graduated at Oxford (Oriel College); in 1840 became rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight; in 1841 was appointed chaplain to the Prince Consort; and in 1845 became bishop of Oxford. In 1869 he was appointed bishop of Winchester. Though a High-churchman, he did not join the Oxford movement; but several members of his family went over to the Church of Rome. His cleverness and persuasiveness of speech and manner gained him the nickname of "Soapy Sam," which he explained as due to the fact that he was "often in hot water, and always came out with clean hands." He published, with his brother, a life of his father (1838), and his correspondence (1840). He wrote "Note-Book of a Country Clergyman" (1832), "Agathos" (1839), "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America" (1844), etc.

Wilberforce, William. Born at Hull, England, Aug. 24, 1759: died at London, July 29, 1833. An English philanthropist, statesman, and orator: famous as an opponent of the slave-trade. His family held the manor of Wilberfoss in the East Riding, Yorkshire. He graduated at Cambridge (St. John's college), and in 1780 became member of Parliament for Hull. He was intimately associated with William Pitt. About 1787 he met Thomas Clarkson, and began to agitate the slavery question in the House. He supported Pitt, who in 1788, in the absence of Wilberforce, introduced the question in Parliament. In 1792 Wilberforce came in the House of Commons a measure for the abolition, which was thrown out by the Lords: it was not finally passed until 1807. The Emancipation Bill was passed in 1833, a month after the death of Wilberforce. He wrote "A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians" (1797), etc.

(1763), he was imprisoned, but was soon released, and became a popular hero. A scandalous "Essay on Woman," printed for private circulation, was seized, and Wilkes was expelled from Parliament (1764). He went to France; was tried in his absence; and was outlawed for non-appearance. In 1768 he returned, and was elected for Middlesex; was imprisoned; and was expelled from Parliament (1769). He was several times reelected and expelled. In 1770 he was released and elected alderman of London. In 1771 he became sheriff, and in 1775 lord mayor. The resolutions invalidating his elections were expunged in 1782, and he remained a member of Parliament until 1790.

Wilkesbarre (wilks'bar-e). The capital of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, situated in the valley of Wyoming, on the North Branch of the Susquehanna, 97 miles north-northwest of Philadelphia. It is the center of a region of mines of anthracite coal, including manufactures and machinery, etc. It was settled about 1770. Population (1890), 37,718.

Wilkie (wil'ki), Sir David. Born at Cults, Fifeshire, Scotland, Nov. 18, 1775: died at sea off Gibraltar, June 1, 1841. A noted Scottish genre-painter. He studied painting at Edinburgh; settled in London in 1804; was elected associate academician in 1811; traveled on the Continent, especially 1825-28; became royal painter in ordinary in 1830; and was knighted in 1836. His works include "The Blind Fiddler" (1809), "The Blind Fiddler" (1807), "Card-Players" (1807), "Rent Day" (1808), "Village Festival" (1811), "Blind Man's Buff" (1812), "Distraining for Rent" (1815), "Duncan Gray" (1814), "Rabbit on the Wall" (1815), "Sir Walter Scott and his Family" (1817), "Penny Wedding" (1818), "Reading the Will" (1820), "Chelsea Pensioners" (1821), "Parish Beadle" (1823), "Maid of Saragossa" (1825), "Preaching of John Knox" (1832), etc. He is also noted for his etchings.

Wilkinasaga. A collection of medieval Norwegian legends relating to Dietrich of Bern and others.

Wilkins (wil'kinz), John. Born in Northamptonshire, 1614: died Nov. 19, 1672. An English divine and scientist, bishop of Chester. He graduated at Oxford (Magdalen Hall) in 1631, and in 1656 became master of Trinity College, Cambridge. He assisted in founding the Royal Society. He published "Discovery of a New World" (1638), "Discourse Concerning a New World" (1640), "Mercury, or the Secret and Swift Messenger" (1641), "Mathematical Magic" (1648), "Essay toward a Real Character and a Philosophical Language" (1668), "Principles and Duties of Natural Religion" (1675).

Perhaps the works of the celebrated Bishop Wilkins tended more than anything to the ridiculous exaggerated notion existing in England, since even their extravagancies drew a stronger interest to the question. In 1638, when he was only twenty-four years old, he published a little work entitled "The Discovery of a New World; or, a Discourse tending to prove that it is probable there may be another habitable World in the Moon; with a Discourse concerning the possibility of a passage thither." The latter part of his subject was, of course, an obvious mark for the sneers and witticisms of critics. Two years afterwards, in 1640, appeared his more serious treatise entitled "Mercury, or the Secret and Swift Messenger: showing how a man may with privacy and speed communicate his mind to a friend on any distance," in which he urged the reasons in favour of the heliocentric system, and explained and recommended the contrivance especially those drawn from the supposed declarations of Scripture. Whewell, Ind. Sciences, I. 390.

Wilkins, William. Born at Carlisle, Pa., Dec. 20, 1779: died at Homewood, Allegheny County, Pa., June 23, 1865. An American politician. He was Democratic United States senator from Pennsylvania 1831-32; was minister to Russia 1832-34; declined to be Vice-President in 1832; was United States minister to Russia 1834-35; was member of Congress from Pennsylvania 1843-44; and was secretary of war 1844-45.

Wilkinson (wil'kin-son), James. Born at Benedict, Maryland, 1757: died near the city of Mexico, Dec. 28, 1825. An American general and politician. He served in the Revolutionary War in Canada and at Saratoga, attaining the rank of brevet brigadier-general; became secretary of the board of war; was in the Conway Cabal; engaged in trade in the Mississippi valley; attempted treasonably to detach Kentucky from the Union and ally it with Spain; served in the Indian wars, and commanded the right wing in Wayne's victory of Maumee in 1794; became a brigadier-general in 1792; succeeded Wayne as commander-in-chief of the army; was appointed commissioner to receive Louisiana from the French; and was governor of Louisiana 1805-06. He was implicated in Burr's conspiracy, and was court-martialled in 1811, but acquitted. In 1813 he became major-general. He failed as commander in the operations against Canada; was acquitted by a court of inquiry in 1815; but was discharged from the service. He wrote "Memoirs" (1816).

Wilkinson, Jemima. Born in Rhode Island about 1753: died 1819. An American religious impostor. She asserted that she had been raised from the dead, and founded a short-lived sect.

Wilkinson, Sir John Gardner. Born at Hardendale, Westmoreland, Oct. 5, 1797: died Oct. 29, 1875. An English Egyptologist. He was educated at Oxford (Exeter College), and from 1821 spent many years in Egypt in archæological explorations. His works include "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians" (1837-41), "Materia Hieroglyphica" (1828), "Topography of Thebes and General View of Egypt" (1835), "Modern Egypt and Thebes" (1843: later reissued as "Hand-Book for Travellers in Modern Egypt"), "Dalmatia and Montenegro" (1848), "Architecture of Ancient Egypt" (1850), "Popular Account of the Ancient Egyptians" (1853), "The Egyptians in the Time of the Pharaohs" (1857), etc.

Wilkinson (wil'kin-son), Tate. Born in 1739: died in 1808. An English actor. He was a pupil and associate of Foote, and a celebrated mimic. He played with success in London and Dublin, but preferred the provinces. After a time he grew weary of his wandering life, and bought the lesseeship of the York circuit, which he conducted for more than thirty years. Many actors and actresses who were afterward successful on the London stage owed their first encouragement to him: among others Kemble, Fawcett, the elder Mathews, Mrs. Jordan, and Mrs. Siddons.

Willamette (wil-ā'met) River. A river in western Oregon, formed by the Middle Fork and McKenzie Fork. It joins the Columbia north of Portland. On it are Salem and Portland. Navigable for 130 miles; navigable to the falls at Oregon City, and above them to Eugene City.

Willard, Frances Elizabeth. Born near Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1839. An American temperance reformer, editor, and author. She was secretary in 1874 and president in 1879 of the "Woman's Christian Temperance Union," and editor in 1879 of the Chicago "Evening Post." In 1883 she made a journey through the Southern States, organizing bodies of the "Woman's Christian Temperance Union." In 1884 she was one of the organizers of the Prohibition Party. In 1887 she was president of the "World's Women's Union" United States. She his written "Women and Temperance" (1883), "How to Win" (1886), "Glimpses of Fifty Years" (1889), etc.

Willcox (wil'koks), Orlando Bolivar. Born at Detroit, Mich., April 16, 1823. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1847; became colonel in May, 1861; commanded a brigade at Bull Run, and was wounded and captured; was a division commander in the Army of the Potomac in the autumn and received the surrender of Petersburg in 1865. In 1864 he was brevetted major-general of volunteers, and in 1866 was mustered out and was appointed colonel in the same year in the regular army; was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general in 1867; was commander of various posts and departments; and became brigadier-general in 1886. He retired in 1887.

Willems (wil'lemz), Florent. Born at Liège, Jan. 8, 1823. A Belgian genre-painter. He studied at the Mechlin Academy, and settled in Paris in 1844. Among his pictures are "Visit to a Young Mother" (1844), "Woman and Spinning-Wheel" (Schmidtsche, Hamburg), "Adorning the Bride" (Brussels Museum), "Silkmercer's Shop," "Sealing the Love letter," "Departing for the Promenade," "The Music Lesson," "The Bird's Nest," and a number of others are owned in the United States.

Willey (wil'i), Mount. A mountain on one side of the Crawford Notch, White Mountains, New Hampshire, about 4,000 feet high. A landslide in 1826 overwhelmed the inhabitants of the Willey House at its foot.

William (wil'yam). I. A country fellow in love with Audrey: a character in Shakspere's "As you Like it."

William (wil'yam) I., surnamed "The Conqueror," "The Norman," and "The Bastard." [ME. William, OF. Willelme, Villalme, Guillaume, F. Guillaume, Sp. Guillermo, Pg. Guilherme, It. Guglielmo, ML. Guilielmus, Willelmus, Willelmus, Guilielmus, D. Willem, from OHG. Wilhelm, Willihelm, MHG. Wilhelm, Wilhelm, G. Wilhelm, helm of resolution, an epithet of a warrior.] Born at Falaise, Normandy, in 1027 or 1028: died at St.-Gervais, near Rouen, Sept. 9, 1087. King of England 1066–87. He was the natural son of Robert, duke of Normandy, and Herleva, daughter of Fulbert, a tanner of Falaise. He succeeded to the duchy on the death of his father without legitimate issue in 1035. With the assistance of his suzerain, Henry, king of France, he put down a formidable rising of his vassals in the battle of Val-es-Dunes, near Caen, in 1047. In a war which broke out between Henry and Geoffrey, count of Anjou, the next year, he sided with the former, and took possession of the important border fortresses of Alençon and Domfront. He visited, in 1051, his childless kinsman Edward the Confessor, from whom he afterward claimed to have received a promise of the succession to the English throne. In 1053 he married Matilda of Flanders, a descendant of Alfred. He repelled an invasion by the allied armies of Henry, Geoffrey of Anjou, and Theobald of Blois at Mortemer in 1054. Soon after he exacted the homage of Geoffrey of Mayenne, and in 1058, by the victory of Varaville, repelled a second invasion headed by the French king. In 1063 he acquired Maine, which extended his southern frontier almost to the Loire. Probably in 1064, Harold, earl of Wessex, was shipwrecked on the coast of Normandy and fell into the hands of William, who compelled him to take an oath whereby he bound himself to assist the duke in obtaining the succession in England (see Harold II., king of the English). Edward died Jan. 5, 1066, and Harold, in defiance of the oath, procured his own election by the witan. William, on the other hand, obtained a bull from Pope Alexander II., which declared him to be the rightful heir to the throne; landed at Pevensey Sept. 28; overthrew Harold (who fell in the battle) at Senlac or Hastings, Oct. 14; and was crowned at Westminster Dec. 25, 1066. But the conquest of England was only partial; it was completed four years later (in 1070) by the suppression of the last of a succession of English risings in the north and southwest. William exacted the homage of Malcolm of Scotland in 1072. In 1075–76 he put down a rebellion of the Norman barons in England, which thenceforth remained quiet. The rest of his reign was occupied with almost continuous wars on the Continent against the King of France and rebellious vassals, and with quarrels with members of his own family, especially with his son Robert, who headed a revolt in Normandy 1077–80, and with his half-brother Odo, bishop of Bayeux, who was imprisoned on account of his intrigues. William died of internal injuries received from the plunging of his horse in the burning cinders in the town of Mantes, which he had captured while engaged with Philip of France in a war concerning Vexin. William was the first sovereign in English law: indeed, he renewed, with some additions, the "law of Edward the Confessor." However his introduction of continental feudalism in 1070 and 1080 as a means of binding social and political influence. He took care to prevent the Norman barons whom he planted on English soil from becoming too formidable rivals of the crown, by scattering their estates, by maintaining popular courts by the side of the manorial courts, and by requiring an oath of fealty from all landowners, thereby eliminating an essential and dangerous feature of continental feudalism, the exclusive dependence of a vassal on his lord (Gemot of Salisbury, 1086). He abolished the four great earldoms, which had threatened the integrity of the kingdom in the preceding reigns, and restricted the jurisdiction of the earl to a single shire, which became the largest political division, and the governmental unit of which was usually exercised by the sheriff, who was appointed by the king. In 1086 he completed the "Doomsday Book" (which see). He also reorganized the English Church with the assistance of Lanfranc whom he appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He separated the spiritual from the temporal courts, and secured the authority of the crown against papal encroachments.

Norman writers, Norman records, the general consent of the age, confirmed rather than confuted by the significant silence of the English writers, all tend to believe that, at some time or other, some kind of promise of the succession was made by Edward to William. The case of Edward's promise is like the case of Harold's oath. No English writer mentions either; but the silence of the English writers confirms rather than disproves the fact of both. . . . The law of England gave the king no power to dispose of a crown which he held solely by the free choice of the Witan of the land. All that Eadward could constitutionally do was to pledge himself to make it his will in favour that recommendation to the Witan which the Witan were bound to consider, though not necessarily to consent to. That, when the time came, Eadward did make such a recommendation, and that the Witan did act in favour of William, we know for certain. The last will of Eadward, so far as such an expression can be allowed, was undoubtedly in favour of Harold.

William II., surnamed Rufus ('the Red'). Born 1056; died Aug. 2, 1100. King of England 1087–1100, third (second surviving) son of William I. and Matilda of Flanders. He was the favorite son of his father to whom he remained loyal when his elder brother Robert raised the standard of rebellion in Normandy. In accordance with the dying request of his father, he was elected to the English throne by the witan, through the influence of Lanfranc, Sept. 26, 1087, while Robert succeeded in Normandy. A revolt of the Norman barons in England broke out in favor of Robert in 1088. William quickly crushed the revolt, on national militia, by promising the repeal of the forest laws, the reduction of taxes, and good government generally to his English subjects, and the rebellion was suppressed in 1090. He carried on a war in Normandy 1090–91 against his brother Robert, who was compelled to accept a disadvantageous peace. He invaded Scotland in 1091, when he exacted the homage of Malcolm III. In 1093 he appointed Anselm, abbot of Bec, archbishop of Canterbury; but presently became involved in a dispute concerning investitures with the new primate, which continued the kingdom in 1097. In 1094, during a second invasion of Normandy, he found his brother supported by Philip of France, and secured the safe retreat of his army only by a bribe to the latter. In 1096 he took possession of Normandy as a pledge for funds advanced to Robert, who in that year joined in the Crusade. The duchy remained in William's hands until his death. He conquered Maine 1098–99. He was killed, possibly accidentally, by an arrow shot by Walter Tyrrel, while hunting in the New Forest.

William III. Born at The Hague, Nov. 14, 1650; died at Kensington, March 8, 1702. King of England 1689–1702, and stadholder of the United Netherlands. He was the son of William II., stadholder of the United Netherlands, and Mary, daughter of Charles I. of England, and was styled Prince of Orange before his accession to the English throne. His father died before his birth. As the head of the house of Orange he became the leader of the democratic monarchical party in opposition to the aristocratic republican party headed by Jan de Witt. The invasion of Holland by the armies of Louis XIV. caused the overthrow of the aristocratic republican party, and in the same year the office of stadholder which had been abolished on the death of his father, was restored in his favor. He saved Amsterdam by opening the dikes, and succeeded in forming a coalition against Louis XIV. which compelled that monarch to conclude the peace of Nimwegen (1678). He married in 1677 Mary, elder daughter of the Duke of York, who ascended the English throne as James II. in 1685. About 1686 he placed himself at the head of the constitutional opposition in England against the absolutist and Roman Catholic policy of James: and, in answer to an invitation signed by the "seven patriots" (the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Danby, the Bishop of London, Henry Sidney, Lord Lumley, and Admiral Russell), landed at Torbay, Nov. 5, 1688. James fled to France Dec. 22, and William summoned a convention which met Jan. 22, 1689, and settled the crown on William and Mary, who accepted the Declaration of Right, and were proclaimed Feb. 13, 1689. The revolution was effected in England without serious opposition, by the influence of the United Netherlands, the emperor, England, Spain, Brandenburg, and Savoy in the alliance which was completed in 1690. A victory of the allied English and Dutch fleets over the French at La Hogue May 19, 1692, freed the English coast from invasion. William, who commanded the Allies in Flanders, was defeated by Marshal Luxembourg at Steenkerke in Aug., 1692. Queen Mary died Dec. 28, 1694, leaving William sole monarch. The peace of Ryswick put an end to the war with France, Sept. 20, 1697. During the rest of his reign his foreign policy was chiefly directed to preserving the balance of power in Europe by preventing the Spanish succession being united either to France or to Austria on the prospective death without issue of Charles II. With this end in view, he negotiated the first Partition Treaty (1698). When Louis XIV., in violation of treaty obligations, recognized the bequest of Charles II. to Philip of Anjou, William formed the Grand Alliance (1701), which was the soul in the events leading to the War of the Spanish Succession. He died, in consequence of a fall from his horse, before the commencement of hostilities. His reign, although disturbed by Jacobite intrigues and the factory of details high in station (such as Marlborough), witnessed the rise of England to a position of prominence in European politics, and the foundation of the supremacy of Britain.

William IV. Born at Windsor, Aug. 21, 1765; died June 20, 1837. King of England 1830–37, third son of George III. He entered the navy as a midshipman about 1779; was created duke of Clarence in 1789; received the title of Saxe-Kensington in 1818; became heir presumptive to the throne on the death of the Duke of York in 1827; and in the same year was appointed lord high admiral, an office which he was shortly compelled to resign on account of his arbitrary acts. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother, George IV., June 28, 1830. The chief political event of his reign was the passage of the Reform Bill of 1832 (see Reform Bill).

William I. (G. Wilhelm), Born at Berlin, March 22, 1797; died there, March 9, 1888. German emperor (1871–88) and king of Prussia (1861–88), second son of Frederick William III. of Prussia and Louisa, daughter of Duke Charles of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He served with distinction in the campaigns of 1814 and 1815 against Napoleon; married Augusta of Saxe-Weimar in 1829; became heir presumptive, and received the title of Prince of Prussia on the death of his father and the accession to the throne of Frederick William IV. in 1840; made himself extremely unpopular on account of his conservative attitude during the revolutionary movements of 1848; took his seat in the Frankfort National Assembly in the same year; commanded the Prussian army which suppressed the insurrections in Baden and the Palatinate in 1849; was appointed military governor of the Rhineland and Westphalia in 1850; in the same year was promoted to the rank of field-marshal and made governor of the confederate fortress of Mainz in 1854; assumed the regency of Prussia during his brother's illness in 1857; ascended the throne of Prussia on the death of the latter, Jan. 2, 1861; appointed Bismarck minister of foreign affairs in 1862; united with Austria in the war against Denmark in 1864 (see Schleswig-Holstein Wars, 2); commanded in person at Königratz in the Austro-Prussian war (which see) in 1866; became president of the North German Confederation on its formation 1866–67; visited the Paris Exposition in 1867; and accompanied the German armies in the France-German war 1870–71, being present at Gravelotte and Sedan, and commanding the besieging army at Versailles Oct., 1870,–March, 1871, during the siege of Paris. He was proclaimed German emperor at Versailles Jan. 18, 1871, and returned to Berlin March 16. He displayed great sagacity in selecting his ministers and generals, as well as firmness in supporting them against opposition; and shares with Bismarck, Von Roon, and Von Moltke the honor of accomplishing the unification of Germany, under the hegemony of Prussia, in the German Empire.

William II. (Friedrich Wilhelm Victor Albert), Born at Berlin, Jan. 27, 1859. Emperor of Germany and king of Prussia, son of Frederick III. and Princess Victoria of England, and grandson of William I. He was educated at the gymnasium of Cassel and the University of Bonn; married Augusta Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein in 1881; and succeeded his father as king and emperor June 15, 1888. He immediately displayed his intention to exercise personal control of the government, and in March, 1890, dismissed Bismarck who disapproved of his policy.

William, King of Germany. See William of Holland.

William I. Born at The Hague, Aug. 24, 1772; died at Berlin, Dec. 12, 1843. King of the Netherlands 1815–40, son of William V., the last stadholder. He commanded the Dutch troops against the French from 1793 to 1795, when the Netherlands were conquered by the latter and the house of Orange expelled. In 1806 he served as a general in the Prussian army, and was captured by the French at the battle of Jena. His hereditary territories in Germany (the Nassau lands) were in the same year confiscated by Napoleon. He served in the Austrian army at Wagram in 1809, and afterward lived in retirement at Berlin. He recovered his German territories in 1813. On the overthrow of Napoleon the Netherlands and Belgium were erected into the Kingdom of the Netherlands by the Congress of Vienna, and in accordance with its decision, William was proclaimed the first king of the new monarchy, March 16, 1815. At the same time he exchanged his German possessions for the grand duchy of Luxemburg. He was unable to prevent the secession of Belgium in 1830–32. He abdicated in favor of his son William II. Oct. 7, 1840.

William II. Born Dec. 6, 1792; died March 17, 1849. King of the Netherlands 1840–49, son of William I. He served with distinction under Wellington in Spain, and commanded the combined corps in the campaigns of 1815 against Napoleon. He married the Russian grand duchess Anne, sister of Alexander I., in 1816. He was sent to Belgium by his father on a peaceful settlement on the outbreak of the revolution in that country in 1830; and on Oct. 16 recognized the independence of the Belgians, an act which was repudiated by his father. He succeeded, mainly commanded the Dutch army against the Belgians, but was forced to give way before the French in Aug., 1832. He ascended the throne on the abdication of his father Oct. 7, 1840. He made extensive reforms during the revolutionary movement of 1848.

William III. Born Feb. 19, 1817; died Nov. 23, 1890. King of the Netherlands 1849–90, son of William II. He carried out the reforms begun by his father in 1848, and decreed the abolition of slavery in the West Indies in 1862. In 1866 the Dutch Duchy of Limburg, which since 1815 had constituted part of the Germanic Confederation, was incorporated with the Netherlands, and he left the German Confederation, was reorganized as neutral territory under the sole sovereignty of his house.

William I., surnamed "The Lion." Died at Stirling, 1214. King of Scotland 1165–1214. He succeeded his brother Malcolm IV. In 1174 he invaded England, with the result that he was taken prisoner and compelled to do homage to Henry II.

William I., surnamed "The Bad." King of Sicily 1154–66.

William II., surnamed "The Good." King of Sicily 1166–89.

William I. Born at Lauban, Silesia, Sept. 27, 1781: died June 25, 1864. King of Würtemberg 1816–64, son of Frederick I. (the first king of Würtemberg). He commanded the Würtemberg contingent in Napoleon's Russian campaign, and commanded a corps of the Allies 1813–15.

William, Margrave of Baden (originally Count of Hochberg). Born at Karlsruhe, April 8, 1792; died Oct. 11, 1859. A German general. He commanded the Baden contingent in Napoleon's Russian campaign, and fought with the Allies 1814–15. He represented the house of Baden at the Congress of Vienna, and was commander of Baden 1857–59.

William. Born April 25, 1806; died Oct. 18, 1884. Duke of Brunswick 1830–84, second son of Duke Frederick William. He succeeded his brother Charles, and was the last of the Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel line.

William, Prince, of England. Only son of Henry I. of England, perished in the White Ship in the English Channel in 1120.

William IV. Born 1532; died Aug. 25, 1592. Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel 1567–92, son of Philip the Magnanimous. He administered the government during the imprisonment of his father by Charles V. 1547–52. He distinguished himself as an astronomer and as a patron of astronomy.

William I. Born at Cassel, June 3, 1743; died 1821. Elector of Hesse and Landgrave (William IX.) of Hesse-Cassel, son of Landgrave Frederick II. He furnished Hessian troops to Great Britain in the American Revolution; succeeded to the landgrave in 1785; joined the coalition against France in 1792; was made elector in 1803, and was expelled by the French in 1806, his lands being added to the Kingdom of Westphalia in 1807. He reentered Cassel in 1813, and was restored by the Congress of Vienna 1814–15.

William II. Born July 28, 1777; died Nov. 20, 1847. Elector of Hesse 1821–47, son of the elector William I. He served in the Prussian army against Napoleon. He was forced to grant a new constitution in 1831.

William I., surnamed "The Silent." Born at the castle of Dillenburg, in Nassau, April 16, 1533; died at Delft, Netherlands, July 10, 1584. Prince of Orange and Count of Nassau; the founder of the Republic of the United Provinces. He was the son of William, count of Nassau, and Juliana of Stolberg, was educated in the Roman Catholic faith, as a page at the court of Charles V., and inherited the principality of Orange, along with large estates in the Netherlands, from his cousin René or Renatus in 1544. He was appointed commander of the army in the Netherlands and governor of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht by Charles V. in 1555. He served in the war of Philip II. against Henry II. of France and concluded the preliminaries of the peace of Cateau-Cambresis (1559). He succeeded his father as count of Nassau in 1559. Together with the counts of Egmont and of Horn, he addressed a petition in 1565 to Philip II. for the recall of Granvella, the adviser of the regent Margaret of Parma, who was carrying on a bloody persecution of the Protestants. Granvella was recalled in 1564, but Philip II. continued to suppress Protestantism and destroy the political liberties of the Dutch. He united unaltered, and provoked the organization of the League of the Nobility in 1566. In 1567 Margaret of Parma was succeeded by the Duke of Alva, who came with an army of 20,000 Spaniards and instituted a reign of terror (see Council of Blood, The). William, who had in the meantime resigned his offices and retired to Dillenburg, declined to appear before the Council of Blood and proclaimed his adhesion to the Protestant faith. In 1568 he collected two armies, one of which was destroyed by Alva in East Friesland, the other disbanded for want of funds. He began in 1570 to issue letters of marque to seamen who, under the nickname of "Sea Beggars," played a conspicuous part in the war for independence. He himself continued the war on land, and in 1576 brought about the pacification of Ghent, whereby Holland, Zealand, and the southern provinces of the Lowlands united for the purpose of expelling the Spanish soldiery. This was followed in 1579 by the Union of Utrecht between the seven northern provinces (Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Gelderland, Groningen, Friesland, and Overyssel), which formally declared their independence of the King of Spain in 1581, and settled the hereditary stadtholdership in William. He was assassinated at Delft by Balthazar Gerard.

Winchester (win'chester). [Welsh Caer Gwent, white castle; ML. Venta Belgarum, AS. Wintecaester.] A city in Hampshire, England, on the Itchen 11 miles north-northeast of Southampton. Its cathedral is a large church exemplifying much of the development of English architecture. The choir, with square chevet and projecting Lady chapel, shows some excellent 13th-century arcading and good Perpendicular work in the clearstory and chapel; but most of the exterior is uninteresting. The quadrangular tower at the crossing is low and heavy. The Perpendicular west front, with three portals and a great window, resembles a mechanical copy in stone of a framing of upright beams. The interior presents much that is of interest. The long nave is bold and well proportioned, with the old-time English grooming. The arched transepts are of the most impressive early Norman work. The fine carved stalls are of the 13th century. Among the many interesting tombs is that of Izaak Walton (1683). Winchester was successively a British, a Roman, and a Saxon town. It was the capital of Wessex, and the place of residence and coronation of early English kings, and the seat of early English parliaments. In the middle ages it was noted for its commerce, and was especially famous for woolen manufactures. Population (1891), 19,973.

With the assistance of the rector of his school he was enabled to go to the gymnasium at Berlin; and subsequently (1738) studied theology at Halle, where he supported himself by giving private instruction. In 1743 he received a position in the school at Seehausen; in 1748 he was made librarian to the Count von Bünau in Dresden, where he had an opportunity to continue the study of art and archæology at the University of Halle. In 1754 he became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, and was sent by the papal nuncio in Dresden to Italy. He resided chiefly at Rome until early in the study of art. In 1764 appeared his principal work, "Geschichte der Kunst des Alterthums" ("History of the Art of Antiquity"). His previous work was "Gedanken über die Nachahmung der griechischen Werke in der Malerei und Bildhauerkunst" ("Thoughts on the Imitation of Greek Works in Painting and Sculpture," 1755). For a number of years he was papal antiquary in Rome. In 1768 he set out on a journey to Germany, but in Vienna again turned back for Italy. In Triest he was murdered by an Italian.

Windsor (win'zor). A town in Berkshire, England, situated on the Thames 23 miles west of London. It contains a famous royal residence, Windsor Castle, founded by William the Conqueror, extended by his successors, especially by Edward III., and recently restored by Queen Victoria. The castle consists of two inclosed courts separated by the huge round tower or keep. On the lower court or ward face the famous Chapel of St. George and the Albert Chapel (see below). The upper ward is entered by the so-called Norman gateway, which is a pointed arch flanked by cylindrical towers. The east side of the quadrangle is occupied by the queen's private apartments, and the north side by the state apartments. The latter contain many fine works of art and historic relics. St. George's Hall, 200 by 34 feet, is adorned with portraits of British sovereigns by the best contemporary masters. The Waterloo chamber or grand dining-room, the council-chamber, and the state drawing-room contain paintings of equal interest. All the paintings in the old hall-room are portraits by Vandyke, among them Charles I. and his family and four portraits of Queen Henrietta Maria. The private apartments are of high interest, and contain one of the most splendid collections of porcelain existing, especially rich in old Sèvres secured during the French Revolution. The gardens and terraces are very beautiful, and the views of the exterior of the castle, embodying long stretches of battlemented walls broken by numerous towers and dominated by the enormous donjon, are unique. St. George's Chapel, founded by Edward IV. in 1474 and finished by Henry VIII., is in a rich Perpendicular style, with double transepts. The interior is very wide and has elaborate fan-vaulting. The choir is bordered by the ornate carved stalls of the Knights of the Garter, surmounted with their arms. Over every stall hangs the banner of its holder. At the east end, over the fine reredos, is a great Perpendicular window filled with painted glass in memory of Prince Albert. The Albert Chapel, immediately to the east of St. George's Chapel, was built by Henry VII., and George III. formed the royal tomb-house under it. It has been used by Queen Victoria as a memorial of her husband, and the interior is decorated in so lavish a manner that it forms one of the most remarkable existing examples of the art. It is panels, with colored marbles, and covered throughout with sculpture, mosaics, gilding, and precious stones. The windows are filled with painted glass. The sculptural decoration, which presents the family history of the Prince Consort, and the fanvaulting of the ceiling is covered with Venetian mosaics. Toward the east end is a cenotaph of the prince in the form of a Greek temple. The sculptured and painted reredos is by Sir G. G. Scott. The royal mausoleum at Frogmore, near the castle, built by the queen to receive the body of her husband, is in the Byzantine style of architecture, octagonal in plan, surmounted by a lantern, and ornamented with series of arcades. Windsor Forest is in the neighborhood of the town. Population (1891), 12,327.

His own home was at Wildenberg, near Ansbach, where he lived with his wife and child, but he was frequently at the court of that patron of poets, the landgrave Hermann of Thuringia, at Eisenach. He could not read or write, but knew French. He made frequent references to his poverty. He was buried in the Frauenkirche at Eschenbach. He composed lyrics, among them four "Tagelieder" ("Day Songs"); but his principal works are the three epic poems "Parzival," "Titurel" (left uncompleted), and "Wilhelm" (also incomplete). "Parzival," the greatest court epic of Germany, was written between 1205 and 1215: it is based upon French sources, and diffuses Celtic spirit particularly upon a poem by Chrestien de Troyes. "Titurel," written possibly about 1210, goes back to similar sources. The scattered songs of both poems in the Grail and Holy Grail; the former is named from its hero Parzival, the latter from Titurel, the first Knight of the Grail. "Wilhelm" (von Orlens) was finished probably before 1216, is from French national poetry. "Titurel" was subsequently rewritten and completed by a certain Albrecht between 1260 and 1270. "Wilhelm" was later on continued by Ulrich von Türkheim and Ulrich von dem Turlin. Wolfram's works were published by Karl Lachmann in 1833 (6th ed. in 1880).

Works and Days. [Gr. Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι.] The chief poem of Hesiod: so named because it treats of the labors of the farmer, and the lucky and unlucky days for doing them.

In the "Works and Days" there are really three parts, which may once have been distinct: an introductory poem addressed to his brother Perses; then the "Works" proper; and then the "Days," or Calendar. Hesiod and his younger brother Perses had divided the property left by their father; but Perses had got the larger share. Hesiod says by bribing certain judges. Perses now lived in luxurious idleness, and proposed by threats to defraud Hesiod of his other fawsuit. Hesiod reminds Perses and the corrupt judges that Justice, when wronged on earth, takes refuge with her father. Then Hesiod tells with the earliest fable in Greek literature, the "Hawk and the Nightingale." The hawk has the nightingale in his clutches, and in answer to the captive's complaint reminds her that "might is right." Here, too, the poet describes the "Five Ages" of the world — the age of gold, of silver, of bronze, of heroes or demigods (put in, apparently to make a place for the Homeric heroes), and of iron, in which the poet himself has the misfortune to live. From justice the theme changes to work. "Work, foolish Perses; work the work that the gods have set for men." A man who means to work should provide himself with a house, an ox, and household stuff, and that speedily, for delay fills no granaries. The cry of the crane is the signal for ploughing; then the farmer must guide the plough, with many a prayer to Zeus and Demeter, while a slave follows and covers up the seed, "to give trouble to the birds." Then come the rules for all the works and seasons of the farmer's year, and lastly the Calendar, the list of lucky or unlucky days. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 42.

[F. Worms, Hitz., Wurms, Wormez, Wormize, etc., OHG. Wormasza, Wormiza, from L. Borbetomagus, Borbitomagus, Gr. Βορβητομαγος, of Celtic origin.] A city in the province of Rhine-Hesse, grand duchy of Hesse, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, in lat. 49° 38′ N., long. 8° 22′ E. It is the center of a rich wine-producing region. The cathedral was begun in the 11th and finished in the 12th century. It is a fine example of Rhenish Romanesque, with a projecting apse at the east end flanked by two cylindrical towers between which rises a low octagonal dome. Two towers front the west end, which is flanked by a second pair of cylindrical towers, and a fine arcaded octagonal dome over the crossing. There is lavish building on the exterior of the apse, and the nave, with its pilaster-like buttresses, is simple and dignified. The interior is effective, though marred by the lowering recent decoration of the choir. The baptistery, on the south side of the cathedral, is of the 14th century: it has good tracery, and some admirable reliefs of 1488, illustrating the life of Christ. The richly sculptured south door of the cathedral is of the 13th century. The dimensions are 423 by 87 feet; length of transepts, 120; height of nave, 105. Worms was originally the Celtic town Borbetomagus; was a Roman town until the 5th century; became the capital of the Burgundian kingdom, and famous from its connection with the German heroic cycle (Siegfried, Kriemhild, Brunhild, the Nibelungs); was one of the chief German cities in the middle ages; and from the time of Charles the Great was a frequent royal residence and the seat of diets. It was one of the chief places in the league of Rhenish cities; suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War; was burned by the French in 1689; remained a free imperial city until it was annexed by France in 1801 by the peace of Lunéville; and was ceded to Hesse-Darmstadt in 1815. Population (1890), 23,474.

The greater part of it was granted to Bavaria in 1802; it was given to the former Grand Duke of Tuscany in 1806, and made an electorate; entered the Confederation of the Rhine in 1806, and became a grand duchy; and was ceded to Bavaria in 1815.

Würzburg. The capital of Lower Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Main in lat. 49° 47′ N., long. 9° 54′ E. It is a commercial center, and has manufactures of tobacco, beer, railway-carriages, etc. It contains the former episcopal (now royal) palace, begun in 1720 in the rococo style, and one of the most effective examples of its type. It measures 550 by 290 feet. The grand staircase is unusually fine, and like the chapel is frescoed by Tiepolo. The University of Würzburg was founded in 1403, but was soon discontinued, and was refounded in 1582. It became noted especially for its medical department. Würzburg was the capital of the old principality of Würzburg, and the capital of a grand duchy in Napoleonic times. Its citadel was bombarded by the Prussians July 27, 1866, and the town was entered by the Prussians Aug. 2. Population (1890), 61,039.

Wusterhausen (vös'ter-hou-zen). A small town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Dosse 47 miles northwest of Berlin.

Wuthering Heights (wuwr'ing hits). A novel by Emily Brontë, published under the nom de plume of Ellis Bell in 1846.

Wuttke (vüt'ke), Heinrich. Born at Brieg, Silesia, Feb. 12, 1818: died at Leipsic, June 14, 1876. A German historian and politician: one of the founders of the "Great German" party. Among his works are "Erdkunde und Karten des Mittelalters" (1854), "Städtebuch des Königreichs bei Leipzig" (1869), "Die Entstehung der Schrift" (1872).

Wuttke, Karl Friedrich Adolf. Born at Breslau, Nov. 18, 1819: died at Halle, April 12, 1870. A German Protestant theologian and historian, professor at Halle from 1861. Among his works are "Geschichte des Heidenthums" (1851–53), "Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre" (1874), etc.

Wyandot, or Wyandotte (wī'an-dot), or Wandot (won'dot). [The name means 'calf of the leg,' referring to a peculiar style of cutting meat. The French name was Huron, from the French hure, the arrangement of the hair by the tribe suggesting the bristles of a wild boar.] A tribe of North American Indians. When first known (about 1615) they occupied a narrow territory between Georgian Bay and Lake Simcoe in Ontario. Driven thence by the Iroquois, and with the contest was continued until their defeat by the latter in 1648–49, when many fled to the Tionontati, and with them were driven from place to place. The present name came into use after the removal of part of the tribe together with the Tionontati, then incorporated in it, from Detroit to Sandusky in 1751. Subsequently they spread along the west to the south and west of Lake Erie, and acquired a permanent influence among the tribes of the region. They sided with the French until the close of Pontiac's war, and afterward supported the British in the War of 1812. They now number about 700, chiefly at Quapaw agency (Indian Territory) and in Canada. See Iroquoian.

Wyandotte (wī'an-dot). A city in Wayne County, Michigan, situated on the Detroit River 10 miles south-southwest of Detroit. Population (1890), 3,812.

Wyandotte. A novel by Cooper, published in 1843.

Wyandotte Cave. A cave in Crawford County, southern Indiana, situated near Leavenworth: noted for its extensive chambers and its stalactites and stalagmites. Length, 22 miles.

Wyant (wī'ant), Alexander H. Born at Port Washington, Ohio, Jan. 11, 1836: died at New York, Nov. 29, 1892. An American landscape-painter. He studied in Germany, and settled in New York in 1864. He suffered a stroke of paralysis about 1877, and afterward painted with his left hand.

Wyat, Sir Thomas. See Wyatt.

Wyatt (wī'at), or Wyat (wī'at), Sir Thomas. Born in Kent, 1503: died at Sherborne, Dorsetshire, Oct. 10, 1542. An English diplomatist and poet, sent by Henry VIII. on various diplomatic missions. He wrote the first English sonnets, and his poems were printed with Surrey's in 1557.

Wyatt, Sir Thomas, "The Younger." Born about 1520: executed at London, April 11, 1554. Son of Sir Thomas Wyatt. He commanded at Boulogne; joined with the Duke of Suffolk in favor of Lady Jane Grey and against Queen Mary 1553–54; and led the men of Kent against London in Feb., 1554, but was captured. Webster and Dekker wrote a play on the subject, called "The Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyatt." It was printed in 1607.

Wyatt's Rebellion. The unsuccessful insurrection against Queen Mary and in favor of Lady Jane Grey, led by the Duke of Suffolk and Sir Thomas Wyatt 1553–54.

Wyborg. See Viborg.

Wycherley (wich'ėr-li), William. Born at Clive, near Shrewsbury, England, about 1640; died at London (?), Dec., 1715. An English dramatist. He went to France when quite young, and mingled in the society of the précieuses at the Hôtel de Rambouillet. On returning he went to Oxford, and later to the Middle Temple, and studied law; became a courtier at the court of Charles II.; and was imprisoned several years for debt after the death of his first wife, the Countess of Drogheda, whose fortune involved him in litigation. James II. set him free, gave him a pension, and paid his debts out of admiration for his play "The Plain Dealer." In 1715 he married again, but died shortly after. He wrote the plays "Love in a Wood" (1672), "The Gentleman Dancing Master" (1673), "The Country Wife" (1675), and "The Plain Dealer" (1677).

Wych (wich) street. A London street which opens behind Holywell street, close to the entrance of Clement's Inn. It contains some curious old houses, and is very narrow. This street is famous in the annals of London thieving for the exploits of Jack Sheppard, who gave rendezvous to his boon companions at the White Lion (now pulled down) in White Lion Passage. It was from the Angel Inn in Wych street that Bishop Hooper, in 1554, was taken to die for his faith at Gloucester. Hare, London, I. 45.

Wyclif, or Wycliffe, or Wiclif, or Wickliffe (wik'lif), John. Born at Spreswel (thought to be either Hipswell or Barford), near Richmond, Yorkshire, about 1324: died at Lutterworth, Leicestershire, Dec. 31, 1384. A celebrated English religious reformer, called "the Morning Star of the Reformation." He was a fellow, and later (1360) master, of Balliol College, Oxford; and became rector of Fillingham, Lincolnshire, in the same year, and in 1368 of Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire, and in 1374 of Lutterworth. (The warden of Canterbury Hall 1366–67 was probably another John Wyclif, of Merton, Oxford, vicar of Mayfield: there is much confusion between the early life of these two.) He went with John of Gaunt as royal ambassador to confer with papal nuncios at Bruges in 1374; was a popular preacher in London; and was summoned before Convocation in 1377 as an enemy to Rome on account of his attacks on the inordinate arrogance and wealth and power of the higher clergy (this blow was really aimed at John of Gaunt). The Pope signed five bulls against him, authorizing his imprisonment. The schism in the papacy, due to the election of Clement VII. in place of Urban VI., induced him to throw off his allegiance to the papacy. He opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation at Oxford in 1380; was condemned by the university; and his party was opposed and persecuted by Courtenay (archbishop of Canterbury) and others in 1382. He went back to Lutterworth, where he wrote ceaselessly and fearlessly against papal claims, and in opposition to mere formalism. On Dec. 28, 1384, he was seized with paralysis while hearing mass, and died in a few days. In 1425 his bones were exhumed, burned, and their ashes cast into the Swift, by order of the Synod of Constance. He made the first complete translation of the Bible into English (about 1382) from the Vulgate, assisted by Nicholas of Hereford. The latter translated the Old Testament and the apocryphal books to about the third chapter of the Book of Baruch. Wyclif certainly translated the Gospels (probably about 1360), and presumably all the rest. He wrote many tracts and sermons: "De Juramento Adabili," "Trialogus," "De officio pastorali," "De ecclesia," "De benedicta incarnatione," "De Dominio divino," etc. His works were edited by the Wyclif Society 1882–92.

Wyclifites, or Wycliffites (wik'lif-ītz). The followers of Wyclif: commonly called Lollards. Wyclif's doctrines, propagated in his lifetime and later by open-air preachers called "poor priests," largely coincided with the later teachings of Luther.

Wycombe (wi'kom), or High Wycombe, or Chipping Wycombe (chip'ing wi'kom). A town in Buckinghamshire, England, 31 miles west-northwest of London. It has manufactures of chairs and lace. Population (1891), 13,455.

Wye (wī). A river in Wales and England. It forms in its lower course the boundary between Monmouthshire and Gloucestershire, and joins the estuary of the Severn near Chepstow, 11 miles north by west of Bristol. It is noted for its picturesque scenery. Length, about 130 miles; navigable for barges to Hereford.

Wygo, or Vigo (vē'gō), Lake. A lake in the government of Olonetz, Russia, 30 miles north of Lake Onega. Its outlet is by the Wyg to the Bay of Onega. Length, 45 miles.

Wykeham, William of. See William of Wykeham.

Wyman (wī'man), Jeffries. Born at Chelmsford, Mass., Aug. 11, 1814: died at Bethlehem, N. H., Sept. 4, 1874. An American comparative anatomist. He graduated at Harvard in 1833; was professor at Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, 1833–1847; and became professor of anatomy at Harvard in 1847. He founded the Museum of Comparative Anatomy; was curator of the Peabody Museum; and was president of the Boston Society of Natural History. He lectured on comparative anatomy and physiology before the Lowell Institute in 1849. He published various technical works.

Wyndham (win'dam), Charles. Born in 1841. An English actor. He studied medicine, but preferred the stage. He went to the United States in 1862, and made his first appearance at Washington. He then served for some time as surgeon in the 19th army corps. He made his first appearance in London in 1865, returned to America the next year, and has since been successful on both sides of the Atlantic. From 1876 to 1886 he managed the Criterion, London.

Wynkin de Worde. See Worde.

Wyntoun, or Winton (win'ton), Andrew of. Lived in the beginning of the 15th century. A Scottish chronicler, canon of St. Andrews. He wrote a chronicle of Scotland (ed. by D. Laing 1872–79).

Wyoming (wī-ō'ming). A State of the United States, bounded by Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, and Idaho. Capital, Cheyenne. The surface is mountainous (the Rocky Mountains), the chief ranges being the Medicine Bow, Laramie, Sweet Water, Big Horn, Wind River, Absaroka, Teton, and Shoshone. The leading industry is stock-raising. There are also valuable coal-mines and silver-mines. It contains 12 counties, has 2 senators, and sends 1 representative to Congress. Wyoming was included in large part in the Louisiana purchase; belonged formerly to Dakota Territory; was organized as a Territory in 1868, and was admitted to the Union in 1890. Area, 97,575 square miles. Population (1890), 60,705.

Wyoming Valley. A valley in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, traversed by the North Branch of the Susquehanna. It is very fertile, and contains beds of anthracite coal. It was settled in 1762 and later years by colonists from Connecticut and Pennsylvania; and was invaded by Tories and Indians under Butler. The defeat of the Americans, July 3, 1778, and the subsequent surrender of the fort, were attended by massacres on the part of the Indians (much exaggerated in Campbell's description in his "Gertrude of Wyoming"). The settlers were finally confirmed in the possession of the valley about 1787.

Wyre (wīr) Forest. A forest in Worcestershire, England.

Wyss (vis), Johann Rudolf. Born at Bern, March 13, 1781: died there, March 31, 1830. A Swiss author, professor of philosophy and chief librarian at Bern. His best-known work is "Der schweizerische Robinson" ("The Swiss Family Robinson," 1813).

Wythe (with), George. Born in Virginia, 1726: died at Richmond, June 8, 1806. An American statesman and jurist. As a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses he drew up a remonstrance to the House of Commons against the Stamp Act; was delegate to the Continental Congress and a signer of the Declaration of Independence; was speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates; was chancellor of the Virginia court; and was professor of law at William and Mary College. He was poisoned in his eighty-first year.

Xanthippus (zan-thip'us). [Gr. Ξανθίππος.] The father of Pericles. He commanded the Athenian fleet at the victory of Mycale 479 B. C.

Xanthippus. A Spartan commander. He organized the Carthaginian army in the first Punic war, and won a victory over Regulus in 255 B. C.

Xanthus (zan'thus). [Gr. Ξάνθος.] In ancient geography, a city of Lycia, Asia Minor, situated on the river Xanthus near its mouth. It was besieged and destroyed by the Persian general Harpagus about 545 B. C., and again by the Romans under Brutus 43 or 42 B. C. Important antiquities were discovered there by Fellows about 1838. Among them is the Nereid monument, so called, a cella with a beautiful Ionic peristyle, dating from the middle of the 4th century B. C. The chief frieze, on the basement, represents a battle of cavalry and footsoldiers; the second frieze illustrates a siege; the third frieze, on the cella, is sculptured with sacrificial and feasting scenes; the fourth frieze, on the entablature, shows hunting episodes and homage to an official personage. The principal parts of the monument have been transported to the British Museum.

Xaraes, or Xarayes. See Charaes.

Xaragua (hā-rä'gwä). A region or "province" in the southwestern part of the island of Haiti at the time of the conquest. Its principal chief was Behechio, whose sister, Anacaona, is celebrated in the early history of the island. See these names.

Xauxa. See Jauja.

Xaver (ksä'ver), Prince (Franz August Xaver). Born Aug. 25, 1730; died at Dresden, June 20, 1806. Younger son of Augustus III. of Saxony and Poland. He served on the French side in the Seven Years' War, and was administrator of Saxony 1763–68.

Xavier (zav'i-ėr; Sp. pron. hä-vē-är'). Francisco (Francis), Saint. Born at the castle of Xaviero, Navarre, April 7, 1506; died on the island of Sanchian, Dec. 2, 1552. A famous Spanish Jesuit missionary, called "the Apostle of the Indies." He was educated at the University of Paris, and was one of the founders of the Society of Jesus. He went to Italy in 1537, and labored there for several years; went to Lisbon in 1540, and sailed from there in 1541 on a Portuguese mission to the East Indies; arrived in Goa in 1542; labored in western and southern India, Malacca, the Moluccas, and Japan; and died on his way to undertake a mission to China. His letters were edited in 1755. He was canonized in 1622.

Xenia (zē'ni-ą). The capital of Greene County, Ohio, 53 miles northeast of Cincinnati; the seat of several educational institutions. Population (1890), 7,301.

Xenien (ksä'ni-en). A series of epigrams by Goethe and Schiller. Most of them were directed against writers of the time.

Xenocrates (zē-nok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ξενοκράτης.] A Platonic philosopher (396–314), the successor of Speusippus as head of the Academy, over which he presided for 25 years.

Xenophanes (zē-nof'a-nēz). [Gr. Ξενοφάνης.] Born at Colophon, Asia Minor, about 570 B. C.; died about 480 B. C. A Greek philosopher, the founder of the Eleatic school. He settled at Elea in Italy about 536 B. C. Fragments of his elegies and his didactic poem "On Nature" have been preserved.

Xenophon (zen'o-fon). [Gr. Ξενοφῶν.] Born at Athens about 430 B. C.; died after 357 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian and essayist, a disciple of Socrates. He joined the expedition of Cyrus the Younger in 401, and after the battle of Cunaxa and the murder of the Greek generals he came the chief leader of the 10,000 Greeks in their march to the Black Sea. (See Anabasis.) He later entered the Lacedæmonian service; fought on the Spartan side at the battle of Coronea in 394; settled at Scillus in Elea; was banished from Athens; and spent his last years in Corinth (?). He wrote the "Anabasis," "Hellenica" (in 7 books), the romance "Cyropædia," "Memorabilia of Socrates" (a defense of his master's memory), "Œconomics," essays on hunting and horsemanship, "Symposium," "Revenues of Athens," "Hiero," "Agesilaus," etc.

Xeres. See Jerez de la Frontera.

Xeres, or Jeres (hā'räs), Francisco de. Born about 1504; died after 1547. A Spanish historian. From 1530 to 1534 he was secretary of Francisco Pizarro, taking part in the conquest of Peru and returning to Spain with the first installment of gold obtained from Atahualpa. By order of Pizarro he wrote a history of the conquest down to Atahualpa's death: this was published at Seville 1534 and 1547. There are several translations and modern editions.

Xerxes (zėrk'sēz) I. [Gr. Ξέρξης, OPers. Khsayarsha.] Born about 519 B. C.; assassinated 465 or 464 B. C. King of Persia, son of Darius Hystaspes; identical with the biblical Ahasuerus. He succeeded to the throne in 486 or 485, assembled a large army for the conquest of Greece; bridged the Hellespont; traversed Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly; was resisted at Thermopylæ (which see) in 480; burned Athens; and was defeated at Salamis (which see) in 480, and returned to Asia Minor. His generals were defeated at Platæa and Mycale in 479, but continued the war with Greece.

The site of this [Xerxes's] bridge is supposed to have been from Nagara Point to the low spot eastward of Sestus, where the level shore on either side is convenient for the march of troops. The channel is more than 7 stadia broad, being about 1¼ miles English.

Ximena (hē-mā'nä). In Spanish history, the wife of the Cid.

Ximena, or the Heroic Daughter. An adaptation of Corneille's "Cid" by Colley Cibber, produced in 1712, printed in 1718.

Ximenes (zi-mē'nēz; Sp. pron. hē-mā'näs), or Jimenes (hē-mā'näs). Francisco. Born at Torrelaguna, Spain, 1436; died Nov. 8, 1517. A Spanish cardinal and statesman. He studied at Alcalá de Henares and Salamanca; went to Rome; took possession of a benefice in Spain by virtue of a papal letter; but was dispossessed by the Archbishop of Toledo and imprisoned. He was after ward restored and made vicar-general; became a Franciscan monk and confessor to Queen Isabella (1492), and later a Franciscan provincial; and was made archbishop of Toledo and primate of Spain in 1495. In 1506–07 he was provisional regent; became a cardinal in 1507, and inquisitor-general; led an expedition against Oran in 1509; and was regent 1516–17. He printed the Complutensian polyglot Bible and founded the University of Alcalá de Henares.

Ximenes de Quesada (hē-mā'näs dā kā-sä'thä), Gonsalo. Born in Granada, Spain, about 1495; died after 1576. Conqueror of New Granada. He was a lawyer, and a judge at Santa Marta; left that place to explore the interior, with 900 men, Aug. 6, 1536; and, after enduring great hardships, reached and conquered the rich plateau of Cundinamarca, and founded Bogota, Aug. 6, 1538. Charles V. refused to make him governor of the country, and he was persecuted and imprisoned. Later he was given military commands, and in 1569 led an expedition into the Orinoco valley in search of El Dorado. Some accounts say that he died a centenarian in 1576.

Xincas (hēn'käs). An extinct tribe of Indians of southern Guatemala, near the Pacific coast, and close to the borders of Salvador. When found by Alvarado in 1524, they were savages of a low grade, living in villages built of wood and thatch. A small vocabulary of their language which has been preserved appears to indicate a distinct stock. It has been supposed that the Xincas occupied the highlands of Guatemala previous to the advent of the Quiches and Cakchiquels.

Xingú (zhēn-gō'). A southern tributary of the Amazon, in the states of Matto Grosso and Pará, Brazil. It was explored by Von den Steinen in 1885. Length, about 960 miles: navigable for steamers 110 miles. Sometimes written Chinga.

Xiphias (zif'i-as). [L., 'the Sword-fish.'] 1. A constellation made by Petrus Theodori in the 15th century, in the south pole of the ecliptic, and now named Dorado.—2. In older authors, a sword-shaped comet.

Xiquitos. Same as Chiquitos.

Xisuthrus (zi-sō'thrus). According to Berosus the historiographer of Chaldea, the name of the last of the first decad of mythical kings of Babylonia, who was advised by the gods to save himself and his family from the deluge by building a ship. He corresponds to the Noah of Genesis and the Hasisatra of the cuneiform account of the deluge.

With the Deluge the mythical history of Babylonia takes a new departure. From this event to the Persian conquest was a period of 36,000 years, or an astronomical cycle called sossa. Xisuthrus, with his family and friends, alone survived the waters which drowned the rest of mankind on account of their sins. He had been ordered by the gods to build a ship, to pitch it within and without, and to stock it with animals of every species. Xisuthros sent out first a dove, then a swallow, and lastly a raven, to discover whether the earth was dry. The dove and the swallow returned to the ship, and it was only when the raven flew away that the rescued hero ventured to leave his ark. He found that he had been stranded on the peak of the mountain of Nizir, "the mountain of the world," whereon the Accadians believed the heaven to rest,—where, too, they placed the habitation of their gods and the cradle of their own race. Since Noah's day among the mountains of Pir Mam, a little south of Rowandiz, its mountain must be identified with Rowandiz itself. On its peak Xisuthros offered sacrifices, piling up cups of wine by seven's; and the rainbow, "the glory of Anu," appeared in heaven, in covenant that the world should never again be destroyed by a flood.

Xivaros. See Jivaros.

Xochicalco (hō-chē-käl'kō). A locality in Mexico, 75 miles southwest of Mexico City, noted for its ruins. The principal structure is a truncated pyramid or mound with 5 terraces supported by masonwork, and a walled area on the summit. Originally there was a smaller stone pyramid on top, but most of this has been carried away for building-material.

Xochimilco (hō-chē-mēl'kō). [Nahuatl, 'field of flowers.'] One of the lakes of the Mexican valley, about 7 miles south-southeast of Mexico City. It is separated from Lake Chalco by only a narrow causeway. At the time of the conquest it was nearly or quite confluent with Lake Tezcuco, which surrounded Mexico.

Xosa (ksō'sä), or Amaxosa (ä-mä-ksō'sä). A Bantu tribe of British South Africa. Their land borders in the north on the Kei River, in the southeast on the ocean, and in the south on Cape Colony. They are closely related to the Zulus. Their language is one of the oldest forms of Bantu speech. Owing to the custom of "uku hlonipa," which forbids a female to pronounce the name of any male relative, or even its emphatic syllable, the women use a different vocabulary from that of the men. The letter X in their name is the lateral click, similar to that used for urging forward a horse.

Xury (zū'ri). A servant of Robinson Crusoe: a character in Defoe's romance of that name.

X. Y. Z. Mission. An American embassy to France in 1797, consisting of C. C. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry. An attempt was made by three French agents (disguised as X., Y., and Z.) to bribe them. The correspondence was disclosed in 1798.

or Ij (ī). An arm of the Zuyder Zee, near Amsterdam, connected with the North Sea by the North Sea Canal.

Yacundas. See Jacundas.

Yadkin (yad′kin). The name of the Great Pedee in North Carolina.

Yaguas (yä-gwäs′), or Yahuas (yä-wäs′). Indians of northern Peru, on the upper Amazon between Nauta and Pebas. They were gathered into mission villages 1683–1737, but now live nearly in a wild state. They go naked, or wear only a strip of bark cloth about the loins, with feather ornaments on the head and wrists. Their arms are lances, bows and arrows, and blow-guns. Physically they are described as a handsome race, and rather light-colored; they are docile and friendly to the whites. Two or three thousand remain. The Yagua language appears to be of mixed origin: it is related to that of the Pebas.

Yahgans. See Fuegians.

Yahoos (yä-hōz′). [A made name, probably meant to suggest disgust; cf. yah, an interjection of disgust.] A name given by Swift, in "Gulliver's Travels," to a feigned race of brutes having the form of man and all his degrading passions. They are placed in contrast with the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with reason, the whole being designed as a satire on the human race.

Yahuas. See Yaguas.

Yahveh (yä-vā′). [Heb. Yahveh or Yahweh.] The Hebrew name of God. See the extract.

> There are two opinions as to what was the actual pronunciation of the sacred name while Hebrew was still a spoken language. On the one hand, we may gather from the contemporary Assyrian monuments that it was pronounced Yahu. Wherever an Israelitish name is met with in the cuneiform inscriptions which, like Jehu or Hezekiah is compounded with the divine title, the latter appears as Yahu, Jehu being Yahua, and Hezekiah Khazaki-yahu. Even according to the Masoretes it must be read Yeho (that is, Yāhiv when it forms part of a proper name. The early Gnostics, moreover, when they transcribed it in Greek characters, wrote Iaō (that is, Yahō). On the other hand, the four consonants, Y H V H, can hardly have been pronounced otherwise than as Yahveh, and this pronunciation is supported by the two Greek writers Theodoret and Epiphanius, who say that the word was sounded Yavé. The form Yahveh, however, is incompatible with the form Yahu (Yeho), which appears in proper names; and it has been maintained that it is due to one of those plays on words of which there are so many examples in the Old Testament. The spelling with a final h was adopted, it has been supposed, in order to remind the reader of the Hebrew verb which signifies "to be," and to which there seems to be a distinct allusion in Exod. iii. 14. Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 75.

Yajurveda (ya-jör-vā′da). See Veda.

Yaka (yä′kä), or Bayaka (bä-yä′kä). A Bantu tribe of the French Kongo, back of the coast-station Mayumba. They are also called Banjolo.

Yakala (yä-kä′lä), or Mayakala (mä-yä-kä′lä), also called Mayaka. A Bantu tribe of the lower Kuangu (Quango) valley, mostly in the Kongo State (lat. 6°–7° S.), but partly in Angola. Their king is called Muene Putu Kassongo, or Muata Yamvo Kassongo, and was nominally a vassal of the Muata Yamvo of Lunda. The tribe forms, ethnically and linguistically, the southern wing of the great Teke nation. The Portuguese call them Maiaccas, and in history they appear as Jaggas.

Yakima (yak′i-mä), or Yakama (yak′a-mä). A tribe of North American Indians found in 1805 on the head waters of Cataract (or Klikitat) and Tapteal (or Yakima) rivers, Washington. Of late the name Yakima includes a considerable proportion of the tribes speaking the Shahaptian language and probably originally having little connection with the Yakima proper. There are now 943 Yakima on the reservation bearing their name in the State of Washington. See Shahaptian.

Yoga (yō'ga). [Skt. yōga, from $\sqrt{}$ yuj, join.] The fourth of the six systems of Hindu philosophy, or the second of the two divisions of the Sankhya system. Inaugurated by Patanjali, of whom nothing is known. It is set forth in the Yogasutra, a little work in four chapters, translated in part by Ballantyne and entire by Rajendra Lala Mitra. The Yoga is commonly regarded as a theistic development of the Sankhya, directly acknowledging Ishvara, or a supreme being. The aim of it is to teach the means by which the human soul may attain complete union with the Supreme Soul. This union may be effected even in the body. According to Patanjali the very word Yoga means "fixing or concentrating the mind in abstract meditation." This is secured by preventing the modifications of chitta, or the thinking principle, which arise through the three pramanas, perception, inference, and verbal testimony, as well as incorrect ascertainment, fancy, sleep, and recollection. These modifications of chitta are prevented by the constant habit of keeping the mind in an unmodified state, and by complete suppression of the passions. This last, vairagya, is obtained by contemplation of the Supreme Being, who is a spirit unaffected by works and afflictions, and is called Om, the repetition of which monosyllable has astonishing results, and the muttering of which, with reflection on its meaning, conduces to a knowledge of the Supreme, and tends to prevent all the obstacles to Yoga. The means of mental concentration are eight: (1) forbearance or restraint; (2) religious observances; (3) postures; (4) suppression of the breath, or breathing in a peculiar way; (5) restraint of the senses; (6) steadying of the mind; (7) meditation; (8) profound meditation or religious trance, this last being best attained, according to the Bhagavadgita (VI. 13), by fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, and similar devices. The system, a counterpart for getting rid of all thought, is a compound of ascetic bodily and mental exercises.

Yogin (yō-gin' or yō'gin), or Yogi (yō-gē' or yō'gē). [Skt., from yoga (which see), yogin being the stem of the substantively used possessive adjective, and yogi its nominative singular masculine.] A follower of the Yoga system; a Hindu devotee or ascetic.

York (yōrk). [L. Eboracum.] A city and county, capital of Yorkshire, situated at the junction of the Ouse with the Ouse, in lat. 53° 57′ N., long. 1° 5′ W.; the seat of an archbishopric. The cathedral (York Minster) is one of the chief English cathedrals, of Norman foundation, but entirely rebuilt in subsequent medieval periods. The transepts are fine, particularly the south transept, built in the first half of the 14th century; it displays three tiers of arcades, increasing in size upward, and the rich gable is almost entirely occupied by a beautiful rose. The square tower of the cathedral (Vanbrugh's front are of the 18th century) is the massive central tower; the Perpendicular choir and Lady chapel are of the 14th. The interior is highly impressive from its size and height. The Transitional nave is of wood. A massive sculptured rood-screen separates the nave from the choir. The Perpendicular window which fills almost the whole east end measures 78 by 32 feet, being surpassed only by that at Gloucester. The north transept possesses the celebrated group of lancets known as the Five Sisters. The cathedral possesses more old stained glass of historic interest than any other in England. Among its tombs that of Archbishop Grey (1255) is the most remarkable. The dimensions are 525 by 105 feet; length of transepts, 249 feet; height of nave, 100; of western towers, 200. The octagonal Decorated chapter-house, without central pillar, is of exceptional beauty. Micklegate Bar is one of the six medieval city gates. It is a high square building of Norman type, with turrets on the angles, whose arch spans the roadway. Besides the cathedral there are several interesting churches, St. Mary's Abbey, and a castle. York was the capital of Britain during the Roman occupation; was visited by Hadrian; and was the place of death of Severus and Constantius Chlorus. In York Constantine was proclaimed emperor. Later it was the capital of the kingdom of Deira, and an important Danish city. It was an early seat of learning. It was taken by William the Conqueror in 1068; revolted and was retaken by him; was frequently visited by medieval parliaments; and was besieged and taken by the Parliamentarians in 1644. Population (1891), 66,984.

York Place. A house formerly given to Whitehall Palace, London.

York Plays or Mysteries. A cycle of 48 plays performed by the Crafts or Mysteries of York on Corpus Christi Day, in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The earliest mention of them is in 1376, when they had already become established some years. They were printed in the Harleian Miscellany from the unique MSS. in the library of Lord Ashburnham.

York River. A river or estuary in Virginia, formed by the union of the Mattaponi and Pamunkey rivers at West Point. Length, 35–40 miles.

Yorkshire (yōrk'shir). The largest county in England. It is bounded by Durham (from which it is separated by the Tees), the North Sea, Lincolnshire (separated by the Humber), Nottingham, Derby, Cheshire, Lancashire, and Westmoreland. It comprises the administrative divisions of North Riding, East Riding, West Riding, and the city of York. It is traversed in the west by the Pennines, and its surface is greatly diversified. It has important mines of coal, iron, and other minerals; flourishing agriculture, especially in the Vale of York, Cleveland, and Holderness; and manufactures of woolens, worsted, iron, etc., in the towns of the large towns Leeds, Sheffield, Hull, Bradford, York, Huddersfield, and Halifax. It belonged to the Brigantes; after the Roman occupation formed the kingdom of Deira and part of Northumbria; and was the scene of numerous Scottish raids, of battles in the Wars of the Roses, of the "Pilgrimage of Grace" in 1536, of an insurrection in favor of the battle of Marston Moor in 1644. Area, 6,067 square miles. Population (1891), 3,208,813.

Yorkshire Tragedy, A. A play produced and printed in 1608, founded on an event which occurred in 1604. It has been attributed to Shakspere, as his name appeared in full on the title-page in the 1608 edition; but it is thought to have been added for the benefit of the bookseller.

Yorktown (yōrk'toun). The capital of York County, Virginia, situated on York River 51 miles east-southeast of Richmond. Here, in 1781, the British under Cornwallis were besieged by the allied Americans and French under Washington and Lafayette, aided by the French fleet under De Grasse. Yorktown was invested by the end of Sept., the first parallel was established Oct. 9, an unsuccessful sortie was made Oct. 16; and the British surrendered Oct. 19. Among the 7,000 prisoners taken by the allies on this occasion was Tarleton. The event virtually closed the Revolutionary War. Here also occurred, during the Civil War, the siege of the Confederates under Magruder, and later under Johnston, by the Federals under McClellan. It was besieged April 5, 1862, and Yorktown was evacuated by the Confederates on May 4.

Ysengrimus. See Reynard the Fox.

Ysolde, Ysonde. See Iseult.

Ysopet. See the extract.

. . . The Ysopet of Marie de France . . . may be said to be a link of juncture between the Fabliau and the Roman du Renart. Ysopet (diminutive of Æsop) became a common term in the middle ages for a collection of fables. That of Marie is by far the most important. It consists of 103 pieces, written in octosyllabic couplets, with moralities and a conclusion which informs us that the author wrote it "for the love of Count William" (supposed to be Longsword), translating it from an English version of a Latin translation of the Greek. Marie's graceful style and her easy versification are very noticeable here, while her morals are often well deduced and sharply put.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 60.

Yssel (ī'sel). The name of several streams in the Netherlands. Among them are: (a) The Nieuwe Yssel, an arm of the Rhine, from which it separates east of Arnhem. It joins the Oude Yssel at Doesburg, and flows as the Yssel into the Zuyder Zee 43 miles east by north of Amsterdam. It receives the Berkel and Schipbeek. Length, about 70 miles; navigable. Yurucares (yö-rö-kä-räs′). [Probably corrupted from the Quichua yuruk, white, and kari, men.] Indians of Bolivia, northeast of La Paz, at the foot of the mountains and in the forest-covered plains between the rivers Mamoré and Beni. They are tall and well formed, and nearly as white as Europeans (perhaps from the effects of a skin-disease). Their dress is a robe of bark cloth stamped with figures from engraved blocks. They are excessively vain, and are given to prolonged drinking-bouts (of chicha, prepared from maize). On his marriage, each man prepares a house and plantation widely separated from all others. They plead maize and manioc, but subsist largely by hunting. Children are often killed to get rid of them; but, by a strange custom, they are never punished, and are allowed complete liberty. The men often engage in duels with bows and arrows. They have a very complicated myth-logy, several hordes are distinguished by different names, but all together do not now number more than 2,000.

Zachariah (zak-a-rī'ä). [Heb., 'remembered by Jehovah'; Gr. Ζαχαρίας.] King of Israel, son of Jeroboam II. See the extract and Jeroboam.

According to the chronology which has passed into general currency from the "Annals" of Archbishop Ussher, and is represented on the margins of most English Bibles, the death of Jeroboam was followed by an interregnum of eleven years, after which his son Zachariah reigned for six months, when he was slain by shallum. The Bible knows nothing of this interregnum, but on the contrary informs us in the usual way that Zachariah reigned in his father's stead (2 Kings xiv. 29). The coronation of Zachariah must in fact have followed as a matter of course, since his father died in peaceable possession of the throne.

W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 145.

Zacharias (zak-a-rī'as). The Greek form of Zachariah, mentioned as the name of several different persons in the Bible.

It includes the Zapotecs, Mixtecs, and several smaller branches (Chatinos, Mazatecs, Chochos, etc.). All are Catholics and submissive to Mexican rule. Estimated number, nearly 700,000.

Zapotecs (tzä-pō-teks'). Indians of southern Mexico, occupying the greater part of the state of Oajaca, and extending into Guerrero. Before the Spanish conquest they formed a powerful nation, and in culture and warlike prowess were not inferior to the Aztecs, whom they successfully resisted in several invasions. Their political system seems to have been a tribal federation. They constructed buildings of stone and mortar; subsisted mainly by agriculture; had a completed hieroglyphic system; and practised sacrifices to their idols. Their system of numeration, calendar, and many of their rites and customs resembled those of the Nahuatl tribes; but their language is entirely distinct. In war they used cotton armor. Mitla and other similar ruins in their territory were regarded by them as the tombs of their ancestors. The Zapotecs were conquered by the Spaniards in 1522–26. After transient revolts in 1581 and 1550, they submitted to missionary influence, and they are now a peaceful and laborious part of the Mexican population. They are intelligent, and frequently attain positions of trust: the celebrated president Juarez was a pure-blooded Zapotec. Estimated number, 260,000, of whom about 50,000 speak only their own language. Also written Tzapotecs or Tzapotecas.

He wrote "Historia del descubrimiento y conquista de la provincia del Perú" (1555: later editions and translations).

Zarathushtra (za-ra-thōsh'trạ). [In mod. Pers. Zardusht, Gr. Ζωροάστρης, L. Zoroastr.] The founder of the Perso-Iranian national religion, which prevailed from the time of the Achæmenidæ (559–330 B. C.) to the close of the Sassanian dynasty (226–636 A. D.). It is to-day represented in Persia and Russian Transcaucasia by a population of about 8,000 in Yazd and neighboring villages, Teheran, Ispahan, Shiraz, and Baku, and by more than 50,000 in Bombay and the vicinity (the Parsis). The many attempts to etymologize the name cannot be considered as more than guesses. The extensive literature regarding Zarathushtra consists on the one hand of notices in Greek and Latin writers, on the other of what can be got from the Avesta and from the later Persian and Parsi literature. The one inference of value from the former source is that Zarathushtra was a historical person. The first inference from the Gathas of the Avesta (see these names) is that they relate to a time and place of transition from a nomadic to an agricultural life. This place must have been in or near the region from which the Vedic Hindus went southward into the valley of the Indus, and the Iranians westward: for the language of the Gathas, and even the primitive types of native mythology in the Avesta, stand very near to the Vedic, and in the absence of special proof to the contrary closely resembling dialects prove a close geographical vicinity. Such proof is not found in the legends that place the birth of Zarathushtra in Rhages or Shiz, both in Media. Mazdayasnianism, reaching its complete development in West Iran, could not in the view of the West Iranian reporters have originated except also in the chief seat of its culture. Supposing the religion to have originated in Bactria and reached its culmination in Media, the reformer and the developer of the sacrificial practice in the Avesta, regarded as a whole, would imply a considerable age for the first beginnings. Both parts then at about that time. Primitive Zarathushtrianism had a brief career, very different from the degraded representations of the Vendîdad and the extravagances of the Yashts. Varuna, the highest of the Adityas, the sons of Aditi, the infinite, the chief god of India, and, especially of the illuminated night heaven, was common to both branches of the Aryan race before its separation into Indian and Iranian. With Varuna were associated the highest spiritual conceptions. These the Hindus soon lost in an ever-increasing tendency to personify and worship the various powers of nature, while the Iranians had a longer career of purity than. The development of the spiritual side of Varuna into the conception of Ahuramazda, the Spiritual Wise One, or the Wise Spirit, or at least the chief representative of this trinity, was the essential fact in the work of Zarathushtra. As Varuna becomes Ahuramazda, the other Adityas become the Amesha Spentas or Archangels, the powerful Holy Ones, the expansion of his qualities and his ministering spirits. From the dominance of the supreme god of light grew a recognition of an opposing principle of darkness; and as light symbolized truth, so darkness, India's natural description in Druj or deceit, the same as Angro Mainyush or Ahriman. The dethroned devas (gods) of the popular religion, who were now no longer the objects of adoration with the supreme Ahuramazda, were regarded as the servants of Druj, and were degraded to the rank of demons or evil spirits. Good thoughts, good words, good actions are the object of moral striving. Holiness is rewarded by immortality and heaven. The tillage of the soil is the best of actions. The elements—earth, air, fire, and water, but especially fire—receive homage as creations of Ahuramazda. Zarathushtra lived under a king, Vishtaspa, who in the epic is king of Bactria. There is absolutely no reason for identifying him with Hystaspes, the father of Darius. Zarathushtra had several sons and daughters. According to the Shâhnamah, he was murdered at the altar by Turanian Brahmans (Turanian = Bactrian).

Zeus (zūs). [Gr. Ζεύς, L. Jovis (gen.), Ju-piter.] In Greek mythology, the chief and master of the gods, the supreme deity, omnipresent and all-powerful, generally looked upon as the son of Cronus and Rhea, and held to have dethroned and succeeded his father. In a narrower sense, he was the god of the heavens, and controlled all celestial phenomena, as rains, snows, and tempests, heat and cold, and the lightning. His consort was Hera. Zeus was worshiped universally; but the most renowned of his sanctuaries were those of Olympia in Elis and Dodona in Epirus. In art Zeus was represented as a majestic and powerful figure, with full beard and flowing hair, in early works sometimes fully draped, but in later art, in general, only lightly draped in the himation. The type fixed by Phidias in the second half of the 5th century B. C., in his great chryselephantine statue for the temple at Olympia, influenced all artists who came after him. The usual attributes of the god are a long staff or scepter, the thunderbolt, the eagle, and sometimes a figure of Victory borne on one hand. The head is generally encircled by a fillet or a wreath: in later sculptures the hair rises from the brow in luxuriant locks like a crown, and falls in masses on either side of the face. Compare Jupiter.

Zimbabwe (zēm-bäb'wā). A ruined city in Mashonaland, southeastern Africa, discovered by Mauch in 1871. See the extract.

> The ruins of the Great Zimbabwe are in south latitude 20° 16′ 30″ and east longitude 31° 10′ 10″, at an elevation of 3,200 feet above the sea-level. They form the principal of a long series of such ruins stretching up the whole length of the west side of the Sabi river, the southernmost, which we visited, being that on the Lundi, and the northernmost in the Mazoe valley. There are also many other ruins on the Limpopo, in the Tran-vaal, in Matabeleland, at Tati, the Inqueboe, and elsewhere, all of the same type and construction; but time would not permit our visiting them. Some are equal to the ruins of the Great Zimbabwe in workmanship, others again are very inferior, and point to the occupation of this country having continued over a long period, probably centuries. These all would seem to have been abandoned at one time in the face of some overwhelming calamity, for all the gateways at the Great Zimbabwe and at Matindela, the second ruin in importance, 30 miles northeast of it as the crow flies, have been carefully walled up as for a siege.

Zrinyi (zrēn'yē), or Zrini, or Zriny (zrē'nē), Count Niklas, Killed at the siege of Szigeth, Sept. 7, 1566. A Hungarian commander, famous for his defense of Szigeth, with a garrison of 3,000, against Sultan Solyman's army, Aug.–Sept., 1566.

> The Turks were pressing forward along a narrow bridge which led to the castle, when the gates were flung open, a mortar filled with broken iron was fired into their midst, and through the smoke and flame Zrinyi led his men to their death. Like the famous Light Brigade, the number of these devoted horsemen was six hundred; their leader tied the keys of the castle to his belt, and the banner of the Empire was borne above his head. Zrinyi fell pierced by two musket-shots and an arrow, and the Turks entered the castle of Szigetvar only to find that a slow match had been applied to a mine containing 3,000 pounds of gunpowder, which speedily sent as many Turks to paradise. The castle still remains a ruin: a monument of the death of a Leonidas and an Alexander.
